There is another class of individuals here to whom, I think, almost the same consideration will apply. We have here four or five great public works in progress. They are all under the control of the Government. There is a swarm of laborers—some native, others of foreign birth, and the latter greatly outnumbering the former; and, whether native or naturalized, they are not identified permanently with the city of Washington, very few of them anything more than temporary residents. Here they are at the will of their employers, liable to be turned off the public works at any moment, and, under the new and little example set by the last Administration, have been turned off by the hundreds simply because of their political associations. That vote amounts, I suppose, to considerable more than a thousand men. We have, therefore, in this city, where the largest vote ever cast was about six thousand, from fifteen hundred to two thousand men who are only temporary and passing residents, having no permanent and abiding interest in the city, dependent upon the executive authority, liable to have their bread taken away from them if they see fit to vote otherwise than they are directed to vote, or as may be pleasing to those in authority. It is that vote which determined the last election, and which may determine the coming one, if the majority should be within five hundred votes.

It is, therefore, not the bona fide, the permanent residents of the city of Washington; it is not those who keep house here; not those who pay the mass of the taxes; nor those laborers who live here and expect to live here permanently; it is not the great body of the honest mechanics resident with their families, such as justly sway the government of Baltimore or Louisville; not those who are born here, and who expect to live here until they die; it is not those who constitute the real bona fide citizens of Washington that, under this bill, are to be allowed to control the destinies of the city of Washington. It is not material whether the temporary residents here are native or foreign. It is enough for me that they are temporary, that they are here at the will of the executive power, and are not persons whose interests are permanently connected with the government they are deciding. We must broadly distinguish between the city of Washington and every other city in the United States. There are, sir, a few cities in the western country where the foreign-born population—the voting portion of it—outnumbers the native population. That presents an anomalous and dangerous condition of affairs; but it is less dangerous and anomalous than that which exists here in the city of Washington, where comers from all portions of the world, living here at the will of the temporary Government, are vested with power to control the destinies of those here permanently; whose property is to be taxed; whose industry is to be burdened; whose lives are to be protected; whose comforts are to be determined; who are here to-day and may be away to-morrow; who do not expect to be here more than three years, and who possibly may leave much sooner. Those, therefore, who have no permanent or abiding interest in the city, are actually electing the officers of the city.

Now, I ask candid gentlemen, upon all sides of the House, to consider with me for one moment this state of things, in the creation and organization of the city government, in connection with the state of things which they were trying to remedy by the police bill, only a few weeks ago. I ask candid gentlemen whether they have not the explanation before them? Is not that a complete and adequate explanation of the condition of the city government? If so, this bill goes to the foundation of the city government, and gives us an opportunity to apply an efficient remedy.

Now, sir, let us see how it has worked heretofore. The present Mayor of the city was, I think, elected by a majority of about twenty-six votes. Well, everybody sees at once that it was the floating, temporary Government vote which elected him. Is he a proper, responsible, honest, and efficient man for the administration of the affairs of this city? Will any gentleman say, in view of the deplorable condition of the police of the city, as gentlemen on the other side of the House represented it here, and represented it truly, only a few weeks ago, that they believe the person charged with the administration of the city government is fit to be where he is, and where the same men would wish to continue him? and if he be not fit, I ask if he was not elected in the manner that I have indicated? I do not wish to say one word about his politics, on one side or the other. I am endeavoring to get at the root of the evil.

Mr. GOODE. The present Mayor was elected, I believe, under the provisions of a bill introduced and carried through by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I think my friend is mistaken. I never introduced and carried through the bill, and my impression is that I voted against it.

Mr. GOODE. The gentleman from Kentucky, I think, introduced the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. No, sir; the bill was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] and I know that I was strenuously opposed to the bill he introduced.

Mr. GOODE. The bill was amended, on motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] so as to exclude naturalized citizens and minors, and under that provision this Mayor was elected.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. My impression is, sir, that I voted against the bill as introduced. I know that I tried to make it as good as it could be made, and I know that I failed in the form in which it was reported.

Mr. HILL. I think it was a better bill than the one now proposed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Well, we tried to amend it, and did succeed in amending it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration proposes to allow everybody who shall have resided here for one year to vote; and that, in my judgment, is radically wrong. Whether they be citizens or foreigners, their interests are not identified with the community. They are swept out like dust if they dare to vote against the Government, and it virtually gives the control of the community to men who are no part of it, but who are under the control of the executive Government.

Well, sir, who is the present Mayor of the city elected by this kind of vote? Why, sir, he has brought on the city of Washington all the evils that gentlemen on the other side have been complaining of here. It is under his administration that these disturbances have, for the first time in the city of Washington, broken out. Outrages of this kind have never been known here before. Mayor Magruder was elevated by the Government to power. There have been occasional and temporary disturbances at an excited election. There have been the ordinary proportion of breaches of the peace, of violence, and of murder, at other times. But never before, in the history of Washington, has it been found that Congress has been moved and excited with reference to their own personal security in passing along the avenue, as has been the case under the existing administration of the city government.

And, sir, I say that it is not the party that happens to be uppermost, or may not be the party that happens to be uppermost at this moment, but it is the radically and inherently vicious system of elections that is at the bottom of it. The authorities of the city of Washington are utterly inefficient; they are utterly corrupt; they are utterly unfit for the positions that they hold; and they are so because the real citizens of Washington do not elect them. They are elected by persons as alien to Washington as those who elected the President were alien to American feelings and interest.

Why, sir, when we strike off what I have designated as the temporary Government vote of the city, and remember that the vote of the city of Washington is only about six thousand, and that the existing Mayor was only elected by about twenty-six majority, we find that nearly two thirds of the whole substantial population was against the man who now holds the position of Mayor. He holds the office by the will of those who hold their bread at the will of the Administration; and how that will is exercised, no one in the least acquainted with the affairs of the city can be ignorant. For the first time in the history of the Government, the working men who earn their livelihood by the sweat of their brow, are denied work on the public buildings if they venture to vote in a mere municipal election against the Government candidate. The present Mayor represents the United States Administration, and not the will of the people—the real industrial and laboring and business men of Washington.

Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that the present Mayor was elected by about one third of the actual bona fide residents of the city, and about two thirds of his vote were of men who were temporary residents of the city. I think a very considerable proportion of them are at the same time residents of the States from which they came, and they go home and vote, as they have the right to do, under a well-recognized principle of law, that a person in the service of the United States, whether civil or military, who leaves the State of his residence for the purpose of entering upon the duties of his office, with the intention of returning after he shall have discontinued the duties of his office, does not change his domicile, and retains the right to vote in the State from which he comes. I know myself a venerable gentleman holding an office under the Government in this city, who for the last forty years, at the presidential elections, has gone home to the county of Kanawha, in Virginia, for the purpose of casting his vote for the candidate of his choice. The practice, I am advised, is exceedingly common, and is a perfectly legitimate one.

Mr. BLISS. The gentleman has referred to a gentleman who has voted in the State of Virginia for the last forty years. I simply rose to inquire whether he was at the same time allowed to vote in this city?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I have no doubt it is so; I cannot state positively; but there can be no doubt that it is within the distinct meaning of this law. Well, Mr. Chairman, this exhibits a state of divided allegiance, or rather of divided interest, which certainly ought not to be allowed.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I should like to ask the gentleman from Maryland a question. I should like to be informed what mode he proposes to prevent the evil which he complains of? The city takes every person who resides here, and permits every resident to vote.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I make a distinction between those who come here to reside permanently and those who come under Executive appointment, and who come here not with the intention of permanently leaving the place of their original residence. I suppose the result of the law is, that such persons are both entitled to vote here and at their original place of residence. I think there is no doubt about it. I desire gentlemen to understand that, in this portion of my remarks, I disclaim any party feeling whatever. But I say that, in my opinion, it is the vote of that class of voters who are not independent of Government control, which is the chief occasion of the outrages that have been recently committed in this city. I think that the principle involved in the clause of the old bill of rights of the State of Virginia, that no person should be entitled to vote who should not have identified himself with the interests of the commonwealth, was a good one. I take it that nobody has the right to have a voice in the Government in which he has not the interest of a permanent residence. The moment there is a change of Administration, when the people shall take charge of the Federal Government, these temporary residents will be removed from office; and under the new doctrine of rotation in office, now accepted by the Administration, whatever party succeeds, there must be a clean sweep of officeholders. And then there is that other class of Government employes who are responsible to the Executive, who are employed by his subordinates on the public works; very little notice is taken of them. No paper takes notice of their removals; no motion is made here to hold the Executive of the United States responsible for turning them off, and depriving them of their bread. If they remember that they are free, and would vote to please themselves, whereby they would displease their employers, they are removed, and others are appointed in their places, noiselessly, but effectually. Yet, sir, it is because of the vote of this class of residents, who have no permanent interest here, that these evils, of which you have complained, prevail. Sir, if that class of voters had been excluded, we should never have known what a government of executive patronage means.

These are the legitimate fruits of a government of executive patronage. In the State we see it only in its milder forms. The officeholders influence other persons, but their votes are comparatively few. Here in Washington, they and the laborers on the public works greatly exceed any majority ever cast. They govern the city, and by them the national Administration governs the city. It is the government of the Cabinet and the bureaus, and not of the people. But for these examples, we would not know what the government of executive patronage is, when reigning supreme and uncontrolled.

Had this influence not predominated in the votes cast at the last mayoralty election, to whichever party they may belong, the present Mayor of this city would not have been in office; for, if the right of suffrage had been confined to those having a permanent interest in the city, to men of business and the laboring men, resident citizens, candidates would be selected to represent their interests, and not the anxieties of the Administration for a municipal triumph, as the key-note of a presidential contest. If that principle had prevailed here, the condition of Washington would have been greatly different from what it has been. There would not have been the lawless outrages committed upon the persons and property of citizens by vagabonds who could not be controlled and punished by authorities themselves stained with greater crimes than they were called on to punish.

The election of last June would not have been stained by innocent blood. The Administration would not then have had a pretext for ordering out the United States marines at an election in the city of Washington; and crime would not have been perpetrated since that dark and bloody day of 1770, when, in the streets of Boston, the British regulars shot down peaceable citizens, whose blood was the seed of the Revolution. The cry of blood unavenged would not have gone up from the streets of the city of Washington—not merely unavenged, but whose authors, to the deep disgrace of those charged with seeing that the laws are faithfully executed, have never been, to this day, put upon their trial even, still less punished. The confidence of the people in their freedom from military violence would not have been shaken by the awful sight of fourteen men shot dead, and twenty more wounded, in the streets of the national capital—men in the uniform and with the arms of the United States with impunity firing into a peaceful crowd of spectators, at a peaceful election precinct—a fire made without warning, without any proclamation, without any order to disperse—ay, sir, and worse than that, without any reason to justify, or even the pretext of a reason to justify it. Sir, gentlemen of the first position and standing in Washington were there, and can testify to it. A dishonest press has attempted, for the benefit of a political party, to cover over the iniquities of that day, and they have, in the opinion of the country, succeeded. I desire here, now, to lift my voice, if it be not yet too late, to wake the feeling of the American people to the deep iniquity which was then committed.

Mr. SINGLETON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. SINGLETON. I would like to inquire whether what investigation has been had in this matter does not show that the whole difficulty was not brought on by a band of men of his own political party coming from his own city?

Mr. GOODE. Unless this debate shall be ruled in order by the Chair, I shall feel bound to object to it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that on a bill to remodel the governing power of Washington, the policy and conduct of the Government is a directly pertinent matter of discussion, or I should not have referred to it.

I respond with great pleasure to my friend from Mississippi. There was—so the grand jury report—a band of from twelve to fourteen young men from the city of Baltimore, who came here on the day of that election, and participated in a disturbance, a mutual fight, at the fourth ward polls. The effort has been, on the part of the authorities, and on the part of the press, to cover the subsequent iniquities by that indefensible intrusion. I trust that I have satisfied the honorable gentleman. I ask his attention while I relate what followed. That disturbance took place at nine o'clock in the morning. It was over in five minutes. It was for the purpose of dispersing a large body of men who had assembled at the polls, and apparently taken possession of them. It was the offspring of momentary excitement, of mutual recriminations arising out of the exclusive possession of the polls by one party. That was the provoking cause; but not a justification. There was a fight with stones and sticks for about five minutes. The crowd was dispersed. This body of men, together with a larger body of young men belonging to the city of Washington, dispersed. They left the second election precinct of the fourth ward, and did not return there again during the day.

At ten o'clock the Mayor came to the polls and saw that everything was quiet; the election was proceeding; and from the time this sudden affray took place in the morning until the appearance of the marines at that precinct at one o'clock, the voting continued without interruption of any kind, so testified to by the commissioners conducting the election; and the voting appeared, by the poll-books, to have been at the rate of one and a quarter per minute, down to the appearance of the marines on the ground.

Mr. SICKLES. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. With pleasure.

Mr. SICKLES. I understood him to say that there never had been any investigation of a public character into the circumstances attending the riot to which he refers. If I am not misinformed, there was a judicial investigation into those circumstances; and that parties were indicted and tried for inciting that riot, and were convicted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I thank my honorable friend for having called my attention to that circumstance. I will observe, Mr. Chairman, that the reason I happen to be familiar with these circumstances is that I was consulted as counsel for the defense of the persons indicted; but because of my personal relations (individual, not political) to some of the gentlemen whose conduct might come collaterally into question, and because of the public nature of the crime committed against the public liberty, which was not to be thus punished, but, I thought, might form a fit object of investigation in this House, I declined. I did not decline until the case had been fully stated to me. The enormity of the conduct of the Government was apparent, and I had been placed in possession of the evidence to substantiate what I here state. I will now respond to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SINGLETON. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. One at a time. Let me respond to the gentleman from New York.

There were thirty-four persons indicted; and of those, four were of the Democratic party. They were discharged, because there was no evidence that they had even been upon the ground.

Mr. SICKLES, (in his seat.) As might have been expected.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The gentleman from New York says, with a smile, as might be expected. Perhaps when I state the sequel, the smile may be on the other side of the face. The residue were put upon their trial, and none of them were convicted. The jury divided on the guilt of the authors of a riot, so palpable to the eyes of the Mayor, who had the marines in charge, that fourteen were shot dead and twenty wounded, for making it! And, sir, of those shot dead and wounded, two only were of the American party, and every other one was of the Administration party, with the exception of two negroes. Is that as might have been expected? You will see, then, that there is no political bias leading me to uncover these enormities. I am not crying out because my political friends have suffered. If the blow was aimed at them, a righteous retribution directed it elsewhere. I speak not for my political friends, but to avenge the innocent blood of my fellow-citizens, who, though my opponents in politics, are still my fellow-citizens, and entitled to my voice, when they become the victims of military violence.

These things can be proved by overwhelming legal evidence in this city, by people of the very first condition; yet these things have not been hitherto so stated. They touch too nearly those in power. Of those indicted, only four were of the Democratic party, and the residue were of the American party; and of the killed and wounded, two were of the American party, and all the rest were friends of the Administration, with the exception of two poor negroes, who were walking across the street, at a distance of three hundred yards from the firing. These are not the casualties of a riot, where some innocent fall with the guilty. Could they have cut down all innocent men, none of the guilty men? In the thirty-four who were indicted, only one wounded man was included. Were the nineteen others wounded, guilty—then why were they not indicted? Were they innocent—then why were they shot? Was the blood then shed justly or unjustly shed? If they were guilty, they could have been indicted. Did they not carry the ear-mark by which they could be tracked? or did their politics hide their wounds?

Mr. SICKLES. Do I understand the gentleman from Maryland correctly as saying that none of the persons indicted for participating in that riot were convicted?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. My honorable friend will allow me to state that there were persons indicted for disturbances of a slight character at other wards in the city; but there was no person indicted specifically for participating in any riot at the time of the firing by the marines. One indictment for the alleged riot of the fourth ward included the whole thirty-four, and covered the whole day. It was drawn as if the purpose had been to convict men for a riot at nine o'clock, and to make that cover the iniquities of the latter part of the day, and mislead the public mind touching the causeless murders by the marines. There was no one indicted for being concerned in the riot at the time the marines fired; and no one of the thirty-four indicted was convicted. The indictment is still pending; but I rather think it is not likely to be tried again.

Mr. SICKLES. The circumstances attending that transaction were all blended together, and all constituted one act, and such was the view of the grand jury which found the indictments; such was the view of the parties at the time, and so it was regarded by the whole country. What I state is, that the transaction was subjected to a judicial investigation by a grand jury, and they found indictments against two persons residing in the city of Washington—I say nothing of the party to which they belong. The matter was tried by a special jury, and—

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Not for that riot. Mr. SICKLES. The gentleman may divide the incidents of that day into periods; but that was not the view at that time, and I do not think it just to make such an imputation upon the authorities.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. It is the authorities that I am now arraigning. The gentleman has only illustrated what I stated at the outset, that the facts have been covered up, the country has been deceived, in order that the guilty might escape. It is the authorities that I am now putting upon trial.

Mr. SICKLES. I am speaking of the grand jury and the court.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. And it is precisely the grand jury and the court that I now put upon trial. This firing was all at one precinct of one ward. The persons who were killed were all killed at one precinct of one ward. The affray at nine o'clock in the morning and the murdering by the marines at one o'clock were at one precinct, and only at one precinct, of the fourth ward. Everything took place within a space of three hundred yards, at particular hours of the day, distinctly ascertained, and susceptible of the most precise proof; and I do not recognize the validity of any appeal to the newspaper statements, unless accompanied with an offer to submit them to the test of a legal examination of evidence.

And now, sir, at one o'clock of the day, when the marines marched upon the ground, the election was proceeding with perfect quiet. How, then, came the marines there at all? Was there a riot? Let the police suppress it. Could they not? Then the marshal was bound to summon the posse comitatus. Was there a riot too powerful for the marshal to suppress? He was never even called on to exert any of his powers—ample for every emergency. It is only where his power is overmatched and defied that the American jealousy of military power allows the President to call forth the Army. Why, then, was it called forth? By what authority, by what blunder, with what bloody intent?

The marines were there by the orders of the President and Secretary of the Navy, on the application of the Mayor, accompanied by an affidavit, neither containing any one legal prerequisite to justify a demand for military aid; neither even stating that the marshal's power was inadequate, still less that it had been invoked and found inadequate. The affidavit and statement both grossly exaggerated and perverted the affray of the morning, and must have impressed both the President and Secretary that a riot still raged where perfect quiet had reigned for hours; yet there was no investigation of their truth. The Executive was swift to hear and believe and act, though the alleged riot was not ten minutes' drive from the President's House, and any firing could have been easily heard in the executive chamber.

No, sir; there was, neither at the time of the letter and affidavit, nor of the asking for or granting of the marines, any riot whatever. The election was proceeding with perfect quiet; both when the marines were ordered out and when they reached the polls. There was not merely no riot which the police could not put down; there was not only no riot which the marshal could not suppress; but there was no riot at all. The marshal was not even called upon. Why, then, were the marines there? Why, sir; unless upon the temptation of some insane impulse, or at the instigation of some person bent upon blood? Still, sir, at whatever bidding, they did defile an American election by the aspect of military power, and they found it quiet. Why were they not instantly marched away? Some boys had followed and passed them with an old swivel, lacking a wheel and actually spiked, and stationed themselves not far from the polls, and a considerable crowd had collected around them—some interfering to induce them to remove the gun, others idle spectators; when—perhaps from some misunderstanding—a charge of bayonets was ordered and executed on the crowd around the swivel. The crowd instantly dispersed; the marines seized the swivel, bayoneted a boy of twelve years old near it, and fired among the retreating crowd. Men were shot as they fled—men not connected even with the swivel, and all the firing was after the marines had possession of the only pretext of the attack. That attack was made upon a body of peaceful citizens standing around that gun. It may have been a blunder—it was not the less a crime. The charging bayonets on peaceful citizens is itself a crime. If they stood they must have been bayoneted; yet why should they be compelled to fly? It was their right to stand there—it was the right of the men to have their gun there for self-defense. The invasion of that right, under an erroneous and hasty impression, was the first act of the deplorable drama of blood which followed. Simultaneously with this assault and firing, the main body of the marines began firing in an opposite direction, at crowds of people standing on the sidewalks; not a few of them the best citizens of Washington, as respectable as any in this House. One gentleman who had served in the Mexican war, seeing the marines bring their guns to a level, and that they were about to fire, and that people around him were scattering, said if he was to be shot he would not be shot in the back, and stood his ground, while men fell dead upon both sides of him. Did the marines fire in self-defense? Only one was wounded by a ball in the mouth, just at the moment when he was about to fire, and at the close of the charge of bayonets. With that exception, no marine was wounded. They shot over thirty men to quell a riot in which the only persons injured were their victims! The whole tenor of the evidence is that no stones were thrown or pistols fired at the marines till after they had fired. Still less was there any riot so violent and overbearing as to defy the police, overmatch the marshal, and require this last resort, the extreme remedy of a military execution. To march the marines to that precinct was a grave usurpation; the men they killed were murdered.

Now, sir, when a man is found dead in his bed in his home, with his family, there is an inquest; when a man cuts his throat in his own house, there is an inquest; when a man is found dead in the street in the morning, there is an inquest. Here fourteen men were killed in open day, in the peace of the Republic, and by her soldiers. Two inquests were held; of only one did the finding ever transpire, and that finding was as follows:

"That the said Cornelius H. Alston came to his death by a gunshot wound received while standing peaceably and quietly at the corner of Seventh street, opposite the Northern Liberties market, (recently his place of business,) from a detachment of United States marines, acting under the control of the Mayor of Washington; and the jury further find, from the concurrent testimony of all the witnesses, that the firing by the marines was all subsequent to the obtaining possession of the swivel."

After that verdict, no other coroner in Washington could be found to repeat the inquest.

When a man is shot, prima facie it is murder. That finding was an adequate foundation for an indictment. All the circumstances raised a presumption of murder. There was no riot; no necessity for the interposition of a military force; no necessity for anything except the ordinary police. No attempt was made to call out the posse of the marshal; and consequently the Mayor or the marines were guilty of fourteen murders—one fixed already by the inquest. Magistrate after magistrate was applied to for a warrant to arrest Mayor Magruder and those who were guilty of the firing of the marines, and not one could be induced even to administer the oath on an affidavit for the purpose of even inquiring whether the parties charged, being in authority, civil or military, ought not to be tried for killing fourteen people in the peace of the Republic.

There was an examination, as the gentleman from New York states, but it was of an anomalous character. A grand jury summoned to attend the criminal court by the Democratic marshal of the District, was found useful to avert the eye of scrutiny from the perpetrators of the murders. Their legal duty was confined to indicting persons to be tried. They were ordered by the court to make a general examination. They were diligent in pursuit of evidence of riot—they do not seem to have inquired at all into the guilt of the murderers. Their own report shows on its face that if they had intended to do their duty, they should have indicted every marine for murder; yet the idea of such a duty seems never to have crossed their minds. They were not summoned for that purpose; but when they had concluded their case against the rioters, they could not entirely omit the catastrophe of the tragedy, and they close by a passing allusion to the well-known fact that a number of persons were killed and wounded by the firing of the marines, and there they left it. The important fact was never brought out, that at the time of firing there was no riot, no violence, beyond the control of the civil power; that the election was going on peaceably. That fact was concealed by the authorities of the city of Washington, civil and judicial. And now if you wish to know how so glaring a fact came to be covered up, I can possibly throw some light on it. I have here a list of the grand jury, and of the petit jury. An analysis of their politics has been furnished me by as respectable a gentleman as there is in the city of Washington. I say that those juries were such as sent Sidney and Russell to the scaffold.

There were twenty-four men upon the grand jury. There were of them six who were old-line Whigs, acting independently of any party. There were on it eighteen who were the decided opponents of the American party; and they were the twenty-four summoned by the Democratic marshal of this District to examine into the guilt or innocence of the Democratic authorities and the American voters, where the question was whether the latter were guilty of riot, or the former guilty of murder, upon the event I have described in this city, where the ratio of permanent inhabitants to temporary inhabitants, and of the American party to the Administration party, is as I have described it in the early portion of my remarks, when speaking of the organization of elected bodies in this city. That grand jury was organized; set to work; succeeded in strengthening all the erroneous impressions which had been conveyed to the country by all the newspapers in this District.

My attention has been called by the gentleman from Mississippi on an important point of this narrative, which I had omitted; and that is, that of those killed and wounded only two were Americans, and that only one of those men killed was from Baltimore, and that was a young man who was brakeman on the Baltimore and Washington railroad, and came here that morning on the cars; and he happened to be a Democrat. I mention these facts not for the purpose of casting odium upon any one, but because the question of my honorable friend from Mississippi only shows that, in his mind, an impression exists that men of the American party were the rioters; that they came from Baltimore; that they were the sufferers by the firing; and that the Government did not do the world much harm by that short method of dealing with them. But, sir, the dead and wounded appear not to have been on the side on which they were supposed to have been.

Now, sir, with reference to the panel of the petit jury summoned to try the men charged with the riots: there were thirty-two upon the panel. You will recollect that there was not one American on the grand jury, although the American party polled at the election in this city, when Mayor Magruder was elected, within twenty-six of a clear majority of the whole vote polled. On the panel of the petit jury, there were four Americans and twenty-eight opponents of the American party, foreigners or Democrats; and that instrument of judicial torture was selected by the marshal of this District, whose duty it is to select the juries. Let us sum up this extraordinary case—the first example of political persecution through an American judiciary—the first example in my knowledge of a grand jury filled with men of one political party charged to indict men of another political party—the first instance of a panel of a petit jury filled with partisans whose duty was to try their political enemies. There were thirty-four men killed and wounded. There were thirty-four men indicted. Of the men shot, only two were Americans, and thirty were friends of the Administration. Of the men indicted, thirty were Americans and only four Democrats. To investigate a riot laid to the charge of the American party, a grand jury without a single American on it was summoned. To try the thirty Americans indicted, a jury panel was summoned having only four Americans and twenty-eight of their political opponents. By such a tribunal none of them were convicted of riot. By such a grand jury neither the Mayor, nor a marine, nor any one else, was indicted for murder of any of the fourteen killed. The riot was imputed to the Americans, yet no one was by them killed or wounded, except the one marine at the time of the firing. Those who fell, fell before the fire of the marines, under the order of the chief peace officer of the city; and no magistrate has been found who would lend his official aid to bring any of those guilty of the firing to judicial responsibility. Of the fourteen killed only two were the subjects of a coroner's inquest, and only one verdict was ever published.

On such a state of the case, this House owes it to itself; owes it to the blood of its murdered fellow-citizens; owes it to the integrity of their Government; owes it to the jealousy that the American people have ever exhibited of the use of military power, to investigate this matter thoroughly, and to bring the guilty, however high and powerful, to solemn responsibility for this high crime against the public liberty.

Sir, the enormity of this offense against the public liberty is too apparent, when we reflect that this military array was called out without the least shadow of authority of law; that the calamitous events I have depicted were the natural consequences of that illegal act. The Constitution confides to Congress the power to provide for calling forth the military power, of which the President is the merely military officer.

Congress has discharged this delicate duty by placing the Army at the disposal of the President to suppress insurrection, repel invasion, and enforce the execution of the laws; but only when the power of the marshals of the United States have been found inadequate, and after proclamation to the people resisting the Government.

In this deplorable case, the marshal does not appear to have been called on. He summoned no posse; he displayed no power; he was left neglected; his power uninvoked; and the rough hand of military violence was easily, roughly, or carelessly laid on the citizen, spreading death and wounds amid peaceful men around the ballot-box. And they who were guilty of the blood have been left to go free; while the course of justice has been perverted to punish those against whom this military violence was directed, but whom a discriminating power preserved.

These things are of grave and serious import. They are one of many circumstances showing a tendency to resort to military intrusion to accomplish political ends which augur danger to the Republic; and this, as the gravest and most flagrant abuse of military power known to the history of the Republic, deserves, and I trust will receive, at the hands of this House, a searching investigation. If this House neglect the petition of the people of this District, the next House of Representatives will not be so deaf to the cry of the oppressed. It touches the very integrity of our laws, the immunity of the citizen from military violence, the just jealousy of military power which pervades our people; and they will listen to the appeal which their Representatives may neglect.

Mr. BURNETT. It has seldom been my lot, sir, to listen to so extraordinary a speech as the one just delivered by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis.] It would be impossible for me to notice all the points which the gentleman has attempted to make in the hour which he has occupied. He started out with the most startling proposition, and one that, in my judgment, is behind the age, and will not be indorsed by this committee, that there should be attached, as a condition precedent to the exercise of the right of suffrage by the citizens of this country, a property qualification.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I made no such proposition.

Mr. BURNETT. That is the result of the gentleman's argument.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I did not say so. Mr. BURNETT. When I put language in the gentleman's mouth, he can say that he did not use it. I merely say that that is the effect of his proposition. He says that the Departments of Washington are filled by gentlemen from every section of the country, who come here merely for a temporary purpose; that these gentlemen own no property here; that they are not identified with the property interests in the city of Washington; and that their interest was not the same as that of the tax-payers of the city; that they were not only dependent, but that they were under the whip of a master; dependent for their bread upon retaining their positions; and that, therefore, they ought not to be allowed to vote, because they could not exercise the right of suffrage as freemen. Do I do the gentleman any injustice?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. My proposition was to extend the residence required to two years, so as to make it more permanent.

Mr. BURNETT. But the gentleman used language of the purport that I have ascribed to him. Now, let us carry out that doctrine. The distinguished gentleman from Maryland acts principally with the Republican party; and I ask the Republicans to unite with me in determining where it will lead to, and the necessary results and consequences which will flow from incorporating such a theory in our system of legislation. These gentlemen who are here in the employment of the Government are intelligent. Some of them have occupied high positions in this country. Many of them have been members of this House. They have some of the most important interests of the people confided to their care. They come here to the city of Washington, and are required, under the corporation ordinances, to pay taxes and perform all the duties of citizens. They pay school taxes; and where they own personal property it is assessed and taxed also. And are we to be told, as the gentleman from Maryland tells us, that because these men are appointed during good behavior, they are therefore mere slaves of the Administration, and that they ought not to be permitted to exercise the right of suffrage?

Sir, I will say to the gentleman from Maryland that when he makes such a charge as this against the employes of the Government in this city, he does himself no credit. He charges that these men who are here in offices to which many of the great interests of the country are confided, are mere slaves, and do not exercise the right of free will. Now, where will that doctrine lead you? You say that they do not own property here, and are here only temporarily. Well, sir, in New York and other free States, how many landholders have you in the farming interest? How many men are there in the great State of New York who own any farm lands? The number is small as compared with the whole population of the State. Who are the men who work the soil? Why, sir, the laboring men of the country, the industrial classes. They do the work upon the farms; but they own none of the soil or stock or property, and are dependent for their positions upon the will and pleasure of their employers. How is it in the city of Baltimore, the gentleman's own city? You will find there thousands of young men, men of intelligence and education, who are there merely temporarily, serving as clerks in wholesale warehouses, not identified with the property interest of the city, but are merely there at the will and pleasure of your wholesale merchants, your grocers, your tobacco manufacturers.

Will you say that because these men are dependent upon their employers for their bread, they must be excluded from the exercise of suffrage also? Yes, says the gentleman. Then, sir, if that be the doctrine, he will exclude from voting every man in this country who is not a property-holder. That is the effect of his argument. Let us look at it further. You would deprive of the right of suffrage, in my humble judgment, that class of citizens who are among the most meritorious in the country. In my State, Kentucky, every young man who is not the holder of property—our dry-goods clerks, the employees on our farms, the overseers upon our plantations—every one of them who happens to own no property, and yet may be a better citizen and more intelligent in every respect than some of those who are property-holders—all these will be excluded from the right of suffrage. Gentlemen, are you ready for this? Sir, it is in direct conflict with the whole spirit and genius of our institutions. It is at war with the entire principle of republicanism and true liberty; and, for one, I shall, on all occasions and under all circumstances, enter my most solemn protest against it.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURNETT. I will.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I concur with my colleague in his opposition to the principle of a property qualification of suffrage; but, would he consider it right for a young man, for instance, in a dry-goods store in Kentucky, coming from Ohio, to vote in Kentucky while he still held his residence in Ohio, and went there occasionally to vote—living in Kentucky merely as a temporary place of residence, with the intention of returning to Ohio to reside permanently?

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. That which we object to, is, that employes who do not lose their residence in the State from which they came, may jump on the railroad cars at any time and go home to vote.

Mr. BURNETT. My colleague will find that his theory will not do. My colleague will understand that the election laws in our own State require a residence of sixty days within the District before the voter can be allowed to exercise the right of suffrage, yet if they are temporarily absent from their homes, although they may vote where they are in city elections, they return to vote in general elections.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to allow me for a moment? The gentleman may think that his deductions from my remarks are correct; but, sir, I must enter my solemn protest against the deductions of the gentleman, because they cannot be legitimately drawn from what I say. I suppose that at this moment I represent four fifths of the laboring population of Baltimore; the resident, permanent population; men who make up the substance and strength of the country. What I speak of here, is the mere floating, temporary population, which does not reside here at all; who are here visitors, or for mere temporary purposes. Property has nothing to do with it.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman cannot escape the effect of the position he has taken here to-day. It will be understood by the country. I have not misunderstood it. Let us continue to see how this thing will work. The employees of any merchant are in the power of their employers, and their votes may be controlled in the same way. Sir, Pennsylvania is a great State. She has an immense iron interest, which employs thousands of persons, who, with their wives and families, are dependent upon their employment for their daily bread. But according to the theory of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS] these men should be deprived of the right of voting. Because a man is dependent upon his employer for bread, he cannot therefore exercise the right of suffrage as a free agent: that is the position of the gentleman. He cannot draw a distinction between the employees of the Government and any other class of employees. The conclusions I have drawn from his premises are legitimate, and I enter my most absolute dissent to any such doctrine.

But what next? The gentleman from Maryland has taken this occasion, though I cannot see what possible connection it can have with the bill under consideration, to go into what purports to be a history of the riots which occurred in the municipal election of this city last June. He has drawn a picture and presented it to this committee; whether it be true or not, I will not undertake to say. I will not pretend to make an issue with him upon that question. The gentleman stated that what he said was in all fairness, not for partisan purposes. I should have preferred that he should have stated all the facts in connection with the subject, that the House and country might have judged as to the merits of the whole transaction.

The gentleman said, that no such disorder, no such scenes of bloodshed and murder had occurred until the last municipal election in this city. Now, sir, it is necessary, in order that the nature of this whole transaction may be known, that the truth of history may be vindicated, to state, as I do state here to-day, a fact which is susceptible of the fullest proof, that until the birth of Know Nothingism in this country, no such scenes have ever occurred in our whole history. Until it exhibited itself in 1854, the elections in the great cities of the Union passed off quietly and peaceably. But, after the organization of that party, with its secret oaths and its proscriptive principles, scenes of riot and bloodshed followed in its train, and have continued from that time down to the present, wherever the party has been in power.

Now, sir, I do not intend to go into a discussion of that question. If the gentleman wants evidence, I refer him to the history of the city of Baltimore, and the city of Louisville, in my own State, and to the city of New Orleans, since the organization of the Know Nothing party. I say that such scenes never occurred in our history until men banded together by solemn oaths, and met in secret councils for political purposes, swearing allegiance in those oaths to the peculiar tenets of what was known as Americanism, to exclude adopted citizens from all office, to exclude them from the right of suffrage, and to make religious opinions the test of a man's fitness for office. Until these things were done, no scenes of violence marked the history of elections in the cities of this Union.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman permit me—

Mr. BURNETT. Not now. I want to call the gentleman's attention to one fact. While we are comparing notes to-day, I ask the gentleman to let us go home to his own city; and I tell the committee that if they want to hear a tale of horrors; if they wish to hear of outrages which the American people never dreamed of, nor ever before entered the imagination of the masses; if they want to learn how the rights of citizens were totally disregarded, the ballot-box violated, and the freemen of the country outraged, let them read the printed testimony in the contested-election case of Whyte against Harris.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I take it for granted that the gentleman will yield to me under the circumstances.

Mr. BURNETT. For a moment, but not for a speech.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I appeal to his fairness and sense of right how long that moment shall last.

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman wishes to make an explanation, I will yield.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I wish to make a statement on my own part.

Mr. BURNETT. I cannot consent to that. The gentleman can take the floor when I have finished.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. The gentleman has referred to me personally, and I trust he will allow me to finish my sentence, at least. The gentleman has personally introduced me into this debate.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. You referred to my case by name.

Mr. BURNETT. It is a part and parcel of the history of this country.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. The gentleman referred to me by name; and I appeal to his fairness as a gentleman to let me say something in reply. I will put it in the shape of a question if he prefers it.

Mr. BURNETT. It would be impossible for me to yield to the gentleman to make a speech in regard to the merits of his case; and he must see I have never been guilty, knowingly, of discourtesy to any gentleman, and I would be unwilling to do the gentleman from Maryland any injustice.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. The gentleman's allusion puts me in a false position. If he throws me on the necessity of assuming the floor to make a speech to the committee, I should then be checked upon the ground that it was indelicate to speak in my own case in advance of its being brought into the House.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not intend to charge that the gentleman has been guilty of any of the things I have spoken of.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I know that the gentleman did not, and I know that he dare not charge me personally with it.

Mr. BURNETT. When it is necessary, I dare do anything.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I know it; but the gentleman, when he dared do anything, would do it with a regard to the truth.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman must see, when he says I dare not, that that is a term I understand; and whenever it is necessary, the gentleman will find that I never hesitate at any sort of responsibility.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I understand amongst gentlemen that any such remark is unnecessary, because the fact is always conceded. I make the remark because the truth of history, as the gentleman calls it, would not connect me personally with anything objectionable. Will the gentleman allow me to say, or shall I be thrown upon the necessity of asking the House—

Mr. BURNETT. I cannot yield the floor to the gentleman to make a speech. I have referred only to the gentleman's case. I do not intend to be drawn into an argument as to the merits and demerits of either side of the question. I am not discussing the question as to whether the gentleman's party has been guilty of these outrages; but I do say that until the birth of that party no such outrages occurred.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, (in his seat.) There never was any foreign combination until then.

Mr. BURNETT. My colleague says in his seat that there was no such combination. I thank God! that it is being rapidly broken up.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I remarked that there never was any foreign combination in the country until then.

Mr. BURNETT. If you tread upon a worm it will turn upon you. When native-born citizens banded themselves together for the purpose of proscribing a class of our citizens, when that class was assailed with slungshot, bowie-knife, and revolver, there is no wonder that they combined for their own protection.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of this committee for a few moments to the history of affairs in this city. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] says—

Mr. BLISS. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BURNETT. I am only replying to the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. BLISS. I intended to raise a question of order as to the relevancy of this debate; but, as it is suggested to me not to do it, I will decline doing so.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman from Maryland took it on himself to denounce the Mayor of this city as corrupt, and his administration of the city affairs as of the most disgraceful character. I am not here for the purpose of defending the Mayor and corporation of the city of Washington. I have admitted that, in my opinion, there were abuses here, and I have said that I would go with gentlemen for their correction. The gentleman from Maryland stated that we were here on the eve of every election for the purpose of passing a law in order to control the municipal elections. Now, sir, the gentleman himself voted for the very bill under which Mayor Magruder was elected. Here is the record: Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, offered the bill; the previous question was called and sustained; and the gentleman from Maryland voted for the bill.

In speaking of the election riots last June, the gentleman from Maryland said that only fourteen or sixteen of these young men came from Baltimore. I ask him whether he states the facts to the committee on his own authority, or on hearsay?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I stated that I had been consulted as counsel for the defense of some young men who had been indicted, and that, in the course of the consultation, the information which I have given here came out; and if an investigation shall be ordered by this House at any time, what I have stated here can be proved by legal evidence, within the limits of this city. That I have on information which I perfectly rely on.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman said that there was an attempt on the part of a corrupt and venal press to cover up this thing. In answer to that, I will refer to one paper here, not any press of my own party—a press which has never looked with favor upon the Democratic party; but which I will do it the justice to say is, in my judgment, one of the most dignified journals of the Union—more correct in its statements, and more reliable upon the matters of history than perhaps any other; I refer to the National Intelligencer. That paper, the morning after the election, justified the action of the authorities in calling out the marines, and stated that there was a reign of terror here; that bands of rowdies had come to this city from Baltimore, armed with knives, slungshots, and revolvers; that they had made the streets of Washington scenes of terror—that it was impossible to exercise the right of suffrage.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. That is only what I admitted and stated—that the whole press of the city, without an exception, so far as I knew, had concurred in a misrepresentation. Now, if the gentleman thinks that is not a misrepresentation, let him propose a resolution of inquiry, and I stand ready to prove it.

Mr. BURNETT. I am not here for the purpose of gratifying the feelings of any malignant persons by initiating an investigation.

Mr. CRAWFORD. As this question is progressing, and the gentleman is exactly upon that point, I desire to say that I have the finding of the jury upon this very question. They examined more than one hundred and twenty-five witnesses upon this subject. Their report is before me; and, if the gentleman has time, I desire that he shall have it read as a part of his speech, that it may go to the country with his remarks.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will just remark to my colleague, and to the gentleman from Georgia, that, at an early period of the session, I filed a memorial from the citizens of Washington, asking for an investigation; and I will offer a resolution, before this Congress adjourns, repeating the desire to make that investigation. Then gentlemen can come up and establish the facts, or flinch from them.

Mr. BURNETT. I was aware of the finding of the grand jury. It is contained in the Washington Union of the 18th of July, 1857, and is as follows:

The grand jury, having completed their labors for the present term of the criminal court, and the judge of that tribunal having specially directed their attention to the riots in the city of Washington on the 1st day of June last, deem it to be a duty which they owe not less to the cause of peace and good order than to the sacredness of the ballot-box, to present the following summary of the principal disgraceful events of that day:

They have examined upward of one hundred and twenty-five witnesses in relation to the general subject of the riots, and have noted the testimony; from which appears the fact that at the first precinct of the fourth ward polls the balloting proceeded quietly until a few minutes past nine o'clock in the morning, when a party of twelve or fourteen persons, designated as "Kip-Raps" or "Plug Uglies," from Baltimore, came on the ground.

They marched above the polls, clear of the citizens, (from eighty to one hundred of them,) who, in a line, were proceeding toward the window, each voting in turn. Having reconnoitered the premises, the party of strangers left the scene for a short period, and then returned with an increased number of their partisans, also from Baltimore, together with a number of persons who reside in this city. That they were coming to Washington with evil intentions, the chief of police and the captain of the auxiliary guard had reason to suspect several days prior to their arrival. But this apprehension was removed by subsequent information received by the Mayor. However, a detachment of police repaired to the railroad station on the morning of the 1st of June, and there witnessed the arrival of the Baltimore party. The object of proceeding thither was, as stated in evidence, to scan closely the appearance of the strangers, so that, should they commit a breach of the peace, they might be readily identified.

It is proper to remark that the exciting causes of the riot, and subsequent bloodshed, in the fourth ward, may, in the opinion of the grand jury, be ascribed mainly to the presence of these strangers, who were joined by a large number of disorderly persons of this city at or near the polls. At that time an attempt to arrest them must have been ineffectual, owing to the inadequate force of the police then and there present—the Board of Common Council having refused to pass a bill authorizing the Mayor to increase the police force if he should deem it necessary for the purpose of preserving order. It is in evidence that the strangers and their companions were armed with pistols and other deadly weapons, which were displayed with a view to intimidate peaceable citizens from voting at the polls.

This body of men divided themselves into two parties—one going inside, to the fence, near the window, and the other remaining outside of the voters. The latter section soon became troublesome, abusing men in the line, threatening them, and loudly boasting, with others, that they could whip any of their opponents. At this point of the disturbance, they threw stones. Some of them protested against "foreigners" voting, and declared that, elsewhere, they would be debarred from such a privilege. The cry of "fight" was frequently reiterated from the ranks of the rioters. Remonstrance with them was vain; and while a justice of the peace was engaged in the laudable effort to enforce order, by calmly appealing to their better feelings, he was struck with a brick upon the breast, and otherwise assaulted. Other respectable citizens were seriously wounded by the discharge of fire-arms, and missiles thrown both by the Baltimoreans and their friends who acted with them.

The latter encouraged their visiting brethren to make the attack. Fifteen or twenty of the parties impatiently swore that they would "go in," and not wait any longer, when stones were again thrown and pistols discharged by them. By the combined movement and impetuous charge, the line of voters was broken, and in the general alarm the commissioners of election fled, deeming it unsafe to continue at their post. The voters in the line were, for the larger part, naturalized citizens. Driven away, some of them did not return. According to credible witnesses, the aim of the rioters was avowedly against those whom they designated as "foreigners," and whom they would not permit to vote. But it is proper to say that this hostility was not extended to those of American birth, though of politics opposite to their own. The rioters having gained their object in the fourth ward, gave three cheers for their victory. These disturbances occurred between nine and ten o'clock in the morning.

Information of these disgraceful and riotous occurrences was communicated to the Mayor of Washington. At that time there were only one policeman and six or seven members of the auxiliary guard at the fourth ward precinct; these were driven away. The Mayor visited the scene, and, having ascertained the true condition of affairs, forthwith called upon the President of the United States, and requested him to order out the marines for the preservation of the peace. In accordance with representations made, first verbally, and afterwards in writing, and under oath, the President acquiesced, on the ground, as assumed, that the civil force was insufficient to repress the riotous proceedings, against the desperate and superior numbers of the disturbers of the public peace. Accordingly official orders were immediately dispatched to the garrison, requiring the marines to repair to the City Hall, and that they report to the Mayor for duty.

When it became known at the Navy-Yard that the marines had been ordered out, a six pounder or field-piece was taken from the Anacostia engine-house by a party of men and boys, avowedly for hostile purposes, and with which to operate against the military. The persons having it in possession drew it to the first precinct of the fourth ward before the marines reached that neighborhood, and from twenty to twenty-five minutes anterior to that time. The Mayor, returning to the polls, demanded that they be opened; but several persons interposed, saying that they should not until the marines were removed, while another person was at the same time haranguing the excited crowd. The Mayor attempted to address them, and to inform them that the marines were not there to attack, but to protect, citizens in their rights. But he was saluted with cries of "Drive him off!" "Turn him out!" and other similar expressions.

The marines, on their arrival, were taunted by the rioters, and provoking language was made use of with a view to irritate and insult them. During these proceedings a message was sent by the party in possession of the cannon, saying that if the officer in command did not abandon his position, they would fire upon him. It was then that a charge was made upon the gun by the first platoon of the first company of marines, and after two of the marines had been wounded by the rioters. It was taken without bloodshed. Just before this was accomplished, an attempt was made to fire it. The discharge of pistols continued in quick succession, and stones were thrown by the rioters as they retreated from the cannon, and not until then did the marines fire their muskets in the direction of their assailants.

The Mayor did not give the order to fire, nor did either of the officers in command, according to the testimony elicited; and the marines may have mistook for an order to that effect the words "Why don't you fire?" the language uttered by some person unknown to the witnesses interrogated on that point. The marines numbered ninety or one hundred; they were nearly all raw recruits, and principally American-born citizens. After the first fire, in response to the pistol shots, the marines were ordered to discharge their guns in the direction of the flashes of the pistols. The fact is well known that a number of persons were killed and wounded in consequence of the discharge of fire-arms on that occasion.

It should be here stated that the cannon, from its position, would, if fired, have raked the polls and street; and what the effect would have been may be conceived from the fact that it was loaded with about half a pound of powder, sixty or seventy rifle cartridges, (tied in a handkerchief,) eight large stones, and several pounds of shot.

The marines were supplied each with twenty rounds of ammunition; the cartridges containing, in addition to the usual quantity of powder, a ball and three buckshot.

According to the testimony, it was not known, until a few minutes previous to the marines being ordered out, that their services would be required, nor were any persons in the ranks besides the enlisted men.

We repeat, that the police force on that day was insufficient to preserve the peace; and therefore it was deemed necessary to apply to the Executive for a military force, which was granted under the representation of circumstances to which we have already alluded. It should be stated that the riot at the first precinct of the fourth ward was more serious than elsewhere in Washington.

The same parties who there drove peaceable citizens from the polls proceeded, at a later hour, and before the arrival of the marines at the City Hall, to the neighborhood of the south precinct of the second ward. Pistols were fired and stones thrown, from which the police and citizens retreated. Alarm and consternation were naturally produced by these riotous proceedings. At the seventh ward polls there was an exhibition, in one respect, similar to that in the fourth ward, namely, the preventing of persons of foreign birth, but naturalized citizens, from voting.

The grand jury consider it unnecessary to present a longer statement of facts. They have endeavored, as far as the evidence and the nature of the oath administered to them permitted, to discharge their duty impartially, and irrespective of whatever individual opinions may be expressed as to the manner in which they have performed it.

The privileges of the citizen are too dear to be infringed or destroyed by a ruffian force acting in disregard of all law, and hence it becomes the duty of good citizens to indignantly "frown down" any and every attempt to unjustly interfere with constitutional rights, and to provide against the recurrence of such wrongs as those which were perpetrated on the first Monday of June last. Were such things to be continued, self-government would exist only in theory, and a reproach be cast both upon the city which bears the name of Washington, and the institutions reared by a patriotic ancestry for holy purposes and philanthropic ends.

In view of all the circumstances, we declare our opinion that the police force, as at present organized, is not adequate for the purposes intended; and that the law which created it should be amended, so as to enable the force to be temporarily strengthened as occasion may demand.

GEORGE W. RIGGS, Foreman.

WASHINGTON, July 17, 1857.

A word more, sir, in regard to the press which the gentleman pronounces venal and corrupt. The press of Washington, including the National Intelligencer, the historical accuracy of whose statements no one will gainsay, indorsed the action of the Administration, and published to the country a justification of it, in calling out the marines. I appeal to the House if the truth of the statements published by these papers, without respect to party, and indorsed by the finding of the grand jury, with all the facts before them, can be overcome by the mere denunciation of them by the gentleman from Maryland? I ask the Representatives of the people how it is possible to preserve order in this Federal city? How is it possible to protect citizens here on a day like that which occurred at the last election, when a gang of rowdies from the neighboring cities came here, driving resident citizens from the polls, and not only driving them from the polls, but shooting them down; and that, too, when they are around the ballot-boxes exercising a right conferred upon them by the laws of their country?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Allow me to ask the gentleman whether he knows of anybody being killed at the fourth ward before the firing by the marines commenced?

Mr. BURNETT. I know that a resident of the city of Baltimore has been tried and found guilty, for participating in a riot on that day.

Having disposed of the press, let me call the attention of the committee to another fact. I tell the gentleman that until he purges his own household; until he shall have a better state of morals in his own city; until murders and riots cease there—I, for one, will not regard him as competent to advise me in regard to these matters.

What did these rowdies do? They came here and did what I have stated. They took possession of the cars on their way home, and fired at cattle along the route. They committed every kind of outrage, that they could in their situation. But before they reached the city of Baltimore, the cars stopped, and landed these rowdies, these assassins—for that is their proper name—put these assassins off the cars, that they might not be arrested when they should reach that city. And now a Representative of such a constituency, a gentleman who knows that these things existed, comes here, the leader of a great reformation in the city of Washington. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, we have fallen upon strange times.

The gentleman says there has been no investigation; that these things have been covered up; that they have been winked at, and permitted to go by. I do not say that the gentleman from Maryland intentionally misstates anything; and I do not want the remarks I make to be understood as casting the slightest imputation upon the honesty and truthfulness of the gentleman in any statement he makes of his own knowledge.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I said there was an investigation on only one side.

Mr. BURNETT. How does the gentleman know that? Does he know it himself, or does that responsible gentleman to whom he has referred furnish the gentleman with the information?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. It appears upon the face of the matter itself.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman was consulted as counsel by a parcel of these men in regard to those riots, these scenes of violence and bloodshed that produced the terrible consequences which he has depicted so well; and he comes before this House to-day, and tells us what his impressions were as the facts were detailed to him by the very outlaws themselves. Such facts will do for the gentleman to act upon, but they will not do for me or for the country. When the gentleman tells me that this responsible man tells him so and so; and when he tells us that his clients told him so and so; I tell him that I prefer to take the testimony of sworn officers of the law; I tell him that when the law requires the marshal of this District to summon twenty-four discreet, sober men, citizens of the District, householders; and when the law requires the criminal judge to charge the grand jury to inquire into a breach of both the penal and criminal code of this District; and when that grand inquest summons more than one hundred and twenty witnesses before them, and when they make an investigation and present their report under oath to find the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth—I prefer to take that statement in preference to the statements of outside gentlemen, although they may be quite respectable, and though they may be clients of the gentleman himself.

Now, sir, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to another matter of history. He says that the Mayor did nothing in this matter. The gentleman left out of view the fact that the city government was under the control of his party. I mean that the council was, and could govern the city. And it is a fact, as I am informed, and I believe that the record shows it, that that council refused to give the Mayor the aid necessary to prevent rioting, and he had to call upon the President.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says that there was no riot, and that there were no scenes of violence at the time that these marines fired. It was the concurrent testimony of the witnesses who were called before the grand jury that, at the time the marines were marching to the scene where they were required for the purpose of protecting the citizens in their rights, they were not only stoned, but they were fired upon; that a cannon, loaded to the muzzle, was drawn within their view by a gang of rowdies, and carried to the fourth ward polls for the purpose of resisting them in preserving order. And yet the distinguished gentleman from Maryland has endeavored to make martyrs of the persons who were engaged in these riotous proceedings!

The gentleman from Maryland wound up his remarks by telling the committee and the country that we shall always have these scenes of violence here; that they result properly and legitimately from the existing state of things; and that the blood of these murdered victims cries aloud to Heaven for vengeance upon their murderers. I say here, to-day, to this House—and, sir, I am going to make a statement that I believe as firmly as I believe in the existence of a God—that the very organization and formation of such a party as the American party, in the manner in which it was done, must necessarily result in bloodshed and murder.

Sir, the very existence of such an organization, designed to exclude men from office and from the polls because of the places of their birth and their religious views; a political organization secret in its character, held together by oaths, with grips and signs and pass words, and with an obligation upon its members to stand by each other in scenes of danger and violence, must always produce riot and bloodshed and such scenes as we have witnessed heretofore.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just look and see whether this position is correct. Look at the history of the country. Americanism—and I always see proper to call parties by the names they prefer—had its origin in the southern States, in 1854. It originated in the city of New York prior to that, but it had its beginning and commencement in the southern States in 1854.

Mr. HILL. I joined the party in 1844.

Mr. BURNETT. Did the gentleman take the oaths then?

Mr. HILL. No; but I would have sworn fidelity to it, so long as it was true to itself.

Mr. BURNETT. I state a fact of political history—that the party was not known in the southern States as a political organization till 1854. My colleague, [Mr. MARSHALL,] who is one of the leaders of the party, knows that it never had any existence in Kentucky until 1854. Now, what was the result? I want gentlemen to understand that I am not discussing the facts as to which party was to blame at the time the riots occurred, but I desire to show the practical consequences of the formation of the party. Prior to 1854, so far as Kentucky was concerned, we had had peace and quiet. Louisville was noted for its prosperity, its manufacturing interests, and the flourishing condition of its trade. We were all proud of Louisville.

But on the 6th of August, 1855, what was the character of the scenes which were presented in that city? Why, the picture drawn here to-day by the gentleman from Maryland was but a small affair compared with those scenes. The two parties met in hostile array, and the streets of that city, in my own State, were drenched with blood. Men were shot down in the streets and murdered while making their escape from their own flaming dwellings. Men, women, and children were indiscriminately slaughtered. There was a venerable man of the name of Quinn, whose head was white with the frost of many winters, an honest, industrious, and peaceable man, who had lived in the city for thirty years; the torch of the incendiary was applied to his house; and as that poor old man attempted to make his escape from his burning dwelling, he was shot down by assassins near his own threshold. When gentlemen talk about bloodshed and assassination, I ask them if they do not find it resulting from the very organization of their own party?

Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I have detained the committee so long. One word more, and I will take my seat. How will you prevent these things? How are they to be avoided? It is by the passage of a law which will protect the ballot-box, and enable citizens of all parties to exercise their rights without fear of violence. I think that the passage of this bill, which, I believe, the Committee for the District of Columbia reported unanimously, will effect that purpose; and I hope the House will pass it. In saying this, I am not influenced by partisan feelings—for I do not know, nor do I care, what will be its effect upon the approaching election. But I do say that, as the Representatives of the people, having constitutionally the exclusive right to legislate for this District; it is a duty incumbent upon us at least to see that law and order prevail here.

Mr. GOODE obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I ask the gentleman to allow me two or three minutes. I do not propose to detain the House longer.

Mr. GOODE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I did not propose, when this bill came before the House, to enter into any discussion of it. I do not now propose to go into any discussion of its merits. I rise for the purpose of replying to a statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT,] which seemed to be personal to myself. I confess that, when the gentleman made the allusion, which he did, to my contested-election case, when he introduced it in the strong terms which he did, I thought it manifested a spirit of unkindness upon the part of the gentleman.

Mr. BURNETT. I will just say to the gentleman from Maryland that, so far as any unkindness is concerned, he is entirely mistaken. And now, if the gentleman will permit me, I will tell him exactly what I did mean.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I accept the gentleman's disclaimer, but the gentleman made the allusion which he did to me, and I thought it necessary to say just this in reply: I do not feel at liberty, under the peculiar circumstances in which I am placed, to enter into any kind of discussion in reference to the facts which may or may not be elicited in connection with my contested election, and I have only risen to say that I shall reserve what I have to say until the proper time.

Mr. GOODE. This is not the character of discussion under which we shall get through with the business of the District of Columbia. We have but a very short time set apart to devote to this business, and I feel it to be my duty, for the purpose of terminating this debate, to move that the committee rise for the purpose of going into the House to offer a resolution for that purpose. I owe it to the people of this District to take that course; and I therefore move that the committee rise.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I trust the gentleman from Virginia will not attempt to limit this discussion at this particular point. I desire to say something upon this subject, and there are others who wish to speak. Declarations have been made by my colleague [Mr. BURNETT] in regard to the election riots in Louisville, Kentucky, in 1855, which ought not to go unanswered.

Mr. GOODE. That is not a pertinent subject of discussion upon this bill.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I appeal to the gentleman, as a matter of justice, not to move that the committee rise until I have had an opportunity to respond to some of the statements of my colleague.

Mr. GOODE. If this discussion goes on it will take up all the time which has been set apart for the District of Columbia.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will not take many minutes—less now than if I have to get the floor upon some other bill. You will save time by it.

Mr. BURNETT. I appeal to the gentleman from Virginia to yield the floor to my colleague.

Mr. GOODE. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] says it is his intention to move a committee of investigation upon the subject of the election riots in the city of Washington. He will then have the opportunity to reply to his colleague.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. This is the place to reply. I want the reply to go out with the gentleman's speech.

Mr. GOODE. The gentleman has already made one speech to go out with the speech of his colleague.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that I did not provoke this discussion. I am sure that, so far as I am concerned, I have confined myself, in the remarks I have made, to the merits of the bill under consideration. I have not gone into this general discussion. I am opposed to it. But, inasmuch as my colleague has brought the Louisville riots into this debate, I appeal to the gentleman to allow me to reply. I will be very short.

Mr. BURNETT. I appeal to the gentleman from Virginia to allow my colleague the floor.

Mr. GOODE. Very well; I will withdraw my motion that the committee rise, and will yield the floor, temporarily, to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. As I remarked before, it was not my purpose, certainly, in making the proposition to limit the right of suffrage to citizens of the United States in the municipal elections of the District of Columbia, to open the wide field of debate which has been occupied by other gentlemen.

Nor do I think that it was at all necessary to the elucidation of any argument which has been adduced by my colleague, to travel, for illustration, to the constituency which he and I represent, and to the scenes which occurred in Louisville, in 1855. He has drawn upon them as matters which he thinks are necessary incidents to the progress of Americanism.

So far as the riots in the city of Louisville are concerned, I do not feel that, in this place or in any other, it is necessary for me to make any further remark than to say that a resolution was adopted in public meeting by the party which elected me to a former Congress, declaring that that party is not in any way responsible for those riots; that they did not originate with the American party; that the members of that party in Louisville had no design to enter upon any such movement; that the riots were begun by foreigners who were excited, and incited, probably by others, influenced by malice or other improper motive. The American party of Louisville, in view of what had occurred, frankly declared their purpose to be prepared in future to meet whatever might occur; and, disclaiming all responsibility for the past, stated, with the boldness of men who understand their rights, that they will be always ready to protect them, and with whatever emphasis may be required by the circumstances under which they may be invaded.

I was not in Louisville when the riot occurred. I was there two or three days before, and I state here, upon my verity as a gentleman, that so far as I know or ever heard—and I was in the councils of the American party; I was in close connection and communion with the leaders and working men of that party at the time engaged in my canvass—there was neither preparation for, nor contemplation of, a riot, up to the time when I left Louisville. I was called away from the city on Thursday prior to the election by the illness of a member of my family, and did not return until a week after the election had transpired. I therefore speak of those riots from the testimony which was elicited at the time, though a great deal was given which was conflicting and contradictory.

I understand that there were on that day two distinct riots in the city of Louisville. One originated in the upper part of the city, among the Germans; another occurred two miles off, in the lower part of the city, among the Irish. I understand that, in both instances, the firing commenced upon the part of the foreigners. In the upper part of the city the riots commenced among some drunken Germans, who fired from the upper story of a brewery upon a couple of peaceful citizens who were riding along through the streets in their buggy, and were, in fact, going to the country. The police interfered, and were resisted, and the fight between the police and the Germans soon involved others. This occurred early in the afternoon of the day of the election, and was not in the neighborhood of the polls where the election was taking place.

The riot in the lower part of the city originated from the fact that several peaceful American citizens were fired on from upper windows as they walked along the streets. After some four or five had been shot down in their tracks, resistance was made, and the mob was gathered. In the scene that followed much violence was perpetrated; but we must remember that great provocation had been given, and hot blood was already roused to madness. Of Mr. Quinn, whose fate has so started the sympathies of my colleague, I know nothing. I do not remember that I ever saw him or heard of him. He was the owner or superintendent of a row of houses from which some of the firing had taken place, and in which it was reported that a magazine of arms was prepared, and had been arranged prior to the election, and Irishmen were in those houses, apparently ready for the fray. This, as I understand, was the proximate cause of the attack on his property.

In the course of the developments which followed, it was proved, beyond doubt, that some Irish Catholic girls, who were in service at the residences of gentlemen in the city, invoked their mistresses to dissuade their husbands from going abroad into the city on the morning of election day, intimating that scenes were about to occur, or would occur, whose details involved a tale of horror they were not at liberty to mention or to enter upon. This testimony, from such a source, is persuasive, if not conclusive, as to the party by whose intent, and by whose acts the riot originated, which ended in those scenes we all lament. It was proved further that Irishmen were cleaning their fire-arms, and preparing them, by repairs and otherwise, for action, for some days prior to the election day, and that an unusual quantity of pistols, revolvers, and guns, had been purchased from the shops by this class of people. A band of Irishmen, it was said, and if I remember aright it was proved, had come from other places to be present at Louisville at that election, to control our free-born Americans by violence, and to browbeat them and force them from the polls.

These men were supposed to be those found in the second story of the houses in Quinn's row, and many of them actually fled thence after the riot commenced at that point. It is said women and children were there, and that women fell in the shooting that took place. I know not whether this be the truth or not, for there was a great variety and contrariety of testimony taken in relation to the scenes which occurred; but if any female was shot, it was under the circumstances I have described—in that house where a magazine of arms was concealed for purposes of violence, and when a mob had been excited by the fact of peaceable Americans having been ruthlessly fired upon from thence and shot down in the streets. It was deemed unsafe to fight with the adversary concealed in the second story of these houses, and they were set on fire by the rioters. I understand that during the conflagration these arms exploded by bundles and by platoons, where they had been placed beforehand with the cold-blooded purpose of human destruction. Mr. Quinn, as I understand, dressed as a woman, undertook to escape, but was recognized and shot down. He was the owner of the buildings, and was held responsible for all the preparation made for the wholesale murder of our people on that occasion.

It is with no satisfaction I dwell on these facts. I lament the occurrence as much as any one can, and hope never to see anything like it again; but, sir, if such things must transpire, and are to be superinduced by combinations of foreigners in our midst, bent on rule or ruin, the responsibility for the consequences should rest where they properly belong, and they should be examined and commented on cautiously and in a spirit of impartiality. I know well how easy it is for a gentleman in making a speech, like my colleague has done on this occasion, to say that he does not pretend to throw upon one party or the other the onus of these lamentable transactions, for lamentable they are; but when he draws the deduction that all these things must occur so long as there shall exist a party bound together by "horrid oaths," and whose main work is "political and social proscription," there can be no difficulty in detecting the impression he seeks to produce.

In reply to this argument, then, against Americanism, I deny that there is now, or that there ever has been, anything like political proscription at any time in Americanism, properly understood.

From what did that party originate? Primarily, from the organized combination of foreigners which had shed American blood in the city of Philadelphia; secondarily, from the course of your Democratic Administration here appointing foreigners to office, in order to pander to the foreign influence. Those points induced the first idea of Americanism among the native-born. In the great centers of population, the foreign races had approached an equality of numbers with the native citizens; actually, in some places, they had gained a superiority; and with this predominance they made combinations for political purposes, and the acquisition of political control. It was then time for Americanism to begin, and I only now fear it began too late.

When a congress of foreigners assembled at Philadelphia, and published a platform of political principles and the ramifications of their plan throughout the United States—reaching to Louisville, to Richmond, to Philadelphia and to St. Louis—proved by its identity everywhere, that the whole series sprang from one source; when this effort of foreign combination palpably struck at the very organism of the Government, and proposed to modify our system so as to assimilate it to the crude experiments of European republicanism, without a knowledge of the political philosophy upon which our fathers founded the rich legacy they bequeathed to us in our Constitution; and above all, when foreign influence had reached a point at which American Administrations deemed it wise or expedient to combine with it to maintain or acquire political power in this country, the time had arrived, if there was patriotism in the American bosom, for united action among ourselves to secure our household gods.

Mr. SICKLES. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. SICKLES. I desire to inquire whether it was not a part of the platform of the American party to disfranchise foreign-born citizens from the right to hold office, and to deprive those citizens of the Catholic faith from the exercise of the same right? And I desire to say, in this connection, that when the American party, as a party, is held responsible for the scenes which have occurred in Louisville, Baltimore, and New Orleans, the charge is not made that gentlemen of character and standing in that party have conspired to produce or to incite these riots, or that they have taken a personal part in them. The charge is, that the initiation and advocacy of such ideas and such measures directly tend to produce these conflicts and scenes which have disgraced the country.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. My friend from New York does no more, he will observe, than restate my colleague's proposition. It may be in a little more concise language, but it was exactly to that I was replying. We understand that we are not charged, personally, with any of these lamentable occurrences. We know that gentlemen are aware that neither the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HARRIS,] nor the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. EUSTIS,] nor myself, was present at or instigated the riots to which reference has been made. But it is said that these things flow from our political philosophy.

I was just attempting to show that the combination formed by Americans was a combination of resistance to aggressions upon our rights and our Constitution by improper foreign combinations, or combinations of crude foreign political philosophers. When we found that persons in this country, who had acquired, under our laws, the status of adopted fellow-citizens, had neither forgotten their foreign association nor the political philosophy which prevailed in their fatherland, yet who evinced a determination to apply these predilections to our own system, then the American bosom burned with a desire to unite, under our own flag, and under our own philosophy, and to maintain them intact in our midst. We saw hordes of foreigners coming upon us at the rate of four hundred thousand a year, bringing with them all their various nationalities, and indicating all the partialities that were natural enough in their fatherland. We regarded this as our land, and we could not fail to see it was likely to become the camping ground of the nations. We determined that here we would display the banner of our own country, and that we would gather around it; we said to each other it was time to stand by the doctrines of the American Republic as they had been given to us by the sages of the constitutional era. This, sir, was the honest and patriotic desire in which Americanism originated in this country. It had no other source.

But, it is said, we persecute a man on account of his place of birth. I deny that there ever was in the tenets of my party any proscription of men on account of the place of their birth. I deny that any combination, which shall be made by American citizens to maintain one class of persons for political office in preference to another class, can ever, in any proper sense of the term, be called proscription. Gentleman upon that side of the House tell me that they would never vote for me. Why? Because I am an American. They would require me to subscribe to all the chameleon changes of the Democratic faith before I could command their suffrages. I said that I should prefer native-born to naturalized citizens wherever the two were up for office, under the then existing state of things. My pledge was made to the native-born in view of the fact that those very adopted citizens had combined among themselves to force upon my country the dogmas of a foreign school of politics. Have I not the same political right to combine with my fellow-citizens to resist them, that the Democrat has to resist the accession to power, in this country, of Whigs or Americans or Republicans? The argument is the same in both cases; and it is but my political right of preference between individuals or classes that I have agreed to exercise in behalf of the native, and then only as a preference, and not to a degree which seeks absolutely to ostracise any one.

Again, it is argued that Americanism proscribes a man on account of his religion, and that Americans are sworn not to vote for a man for office if he is a Roman Catholic. My reply is this: the great cardinal principle which is, in this regard, the basis of the American party, is opposition to whatever would make a union of Church and State in this country. Our principle aims at this, and no more. They who established originally the platform of the party may have mistaken a case for a principle. It is probable, indeed I feel quite sure, there should have been a distinction drawn between the Papist and the Catholic. I understand that a portion of the Catholic Church holds the doctrine that the Pope—whether it springs from his spiritual power or his temporal power, or both combined—is, in the last resort, the ultimate judge, not only of moral right, but, under the moral law, of political right; and therefore possesses the power, in some way, to absolve the citizen from obedience to the law of the land or country to which he belongs, of which his Holiness may disapprove as an infraction of the Divine Law.

Mr. KELLY. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The gentleman can take an hour to reply to my speech.

Mr. KELLY. The gentleman asserts what is not a fact, and I desire—

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have found a great contrariety of opinions among Catholics upon this particular branch of my subject, and I do not expect that my friend from New York and I shall agree upon what are the facts in regard to it. The fact I state is, that the ultra-montane branch of his Church is understood to hold the doctrine that in the last resort the head of the Church has the moral right to determine what is right and what is not right.

Mr. KELLY. I deny that they hold any such doctrine, and the gentleman states what is not true.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Well, I must say that the gentleman puts his remarks in a very blunt form.

Mr. KELLY. I say that the statement is not true.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Why, surely one branch of the Church holds that doctrine.

Mr. KELLY. I say there is no branch in this country that holds that doctrine; and the gentleman has never seen one that advocates that doctrine.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I tell the gentleman from New York that the doctrine I have asserted is maintained, as I understand it, by the whole ultra-montane branch of his Church; and if I had the time to go into the discussion, I should expect to prove my assertion from the Review by Brownson, and by other Catholic writers in this country. But the gentleman says I have never seen a Catholic of that class. I have never seen a Catholic who did not attempt to get off upon that very branch of the proposition. I have seen very few who, when the question was argued, did not confess to the very distinction I take.

But, sir, the American party intended to assert the principle that no union in this country shall exist between Church and State. That is our principle. As I before observed, I am free to say that the men who first laid down the platform of the American party mistook the case, probably, for the principle, and they would have done better to have asserted the principle only, and have left the Papist to make his war upon it—which I do not doubt he would have done.

But, sir, why talk we to-day about secret combinations, about oaths and grips and degrees? These are the mere formula which once were used by my party. My colleague knows well these formula have long since been dispensed with, and for a year or more there have been, in the American party of the country, no secrets, no mysteries, no degrees, no rituals, no close councils, but only clubs, such as have been constantly formed by the Democratic party and every other party. Whoever sympathizes with us in our sentiments, our purposes, and our views, stands of our party, and is in as open a party as either the Democratic or Republican party. The American party long since cast off all these forms and has long since displayed its principles, purposes, and aims. We invite those who oppose us to discuss the broad platform of our political principles. We claim exactly the privilege of the gardener, who, as his plant grows, clips off here, and cuts off there, a branch which may have taken a false direction, until he presents it to the world as a comely, stately, and well-proportioned tree. We have had to prune, and we have done it. We yet hope to build up an American party, believing that there is American sentiment enough in the country to sustain the effort.

A main object in the commencement of the American organization was the cultivation of a spirit of American nationality, of love for our own native land, of love for our institutions as derived from the Constitution. We will carry our plan further. We aim at protection to American labor; protection to American industry; the enlargement of the sphere of American commerce; the increase of American efficiency abroad, by administrative conduct at home upon the broad political principles which constitute the basis of our philosophy. We hope yet to bring within the fold of our party every well-wisher of his country, without regard to former political combinations. Such has been and is our design. This miserable agitation about slavery entered our councils as it entered the councils of both the Democratic and Whig parties. We split to pieces upon that rock in 1854 and 1855. Whether we shall ever recover from it is a problem for the future. A great many members of the Democratic party—as they have done upon other signal occasions—came into the American party, but afterwards left it. A Democrat gravitates towards that party, no matter where it goes, and seems to be satisfied, no matter what it does. I freely acknowledge that I was sorry they left us; but their departure left no doubt as to the correctness of American principles, or the necessity for their application.

Sir, those principles which I do to live by, to stand by, and they will do to die by in this country.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I believe that; for the party has taken its departure from this life already. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Let the gentleman not lay that flattering unction to his soul. Many a gentleman on that side of the Chamber now congratulates himself in a seat on this floor who yet feels in his heart of hearts that the minority that he overcame consists of staunch and true and firm Americans, who will buckle on their armor for the next contest, and at all times hereafter, as they did heretofore. A million of Americans appeared, under most adverse circumstances, in the last presidential election. They will be found hereafter standing by those same principles; and, my word for it, they will refuse all combinations that propose to falsify them, or to abate one jot or tittle of their strength and patriotic purpose. For one, I expect to stand by those principles now, and at all times hereafter. I expect that the men who voted for Millard Fillmore in the last presidential election will stand by them; that they will guard them jealously, and will preserve them reverently, and will fight for them in the future as in the past, only with greater zeal and with renewed and redoubled exertions. The American party dead! Why, sir, although it may come out of the errors of administration, although it may be a result of wanton expenditures, or of unequal action in guarding the rights of American citizens abroad, or it may spring from a sense upon the part of the people of this country that the Administration must be committed to hands that will protect American citizens abroad and at home, we hope that, in the progress of years, this nucleus of a million of voting Americans will gather strength until it shall spread into a tree that will overshadow this American land, and under which our people will live through a future of bright prosperity.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Does the gentleman allude to the murder of Colonel Crittenden and his friends when he speaks of American citizens not being protected?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. No, sir; no, sir. I did not think of that.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I supposed you did.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. No; it was not on my mind. If I had time I would tell you what I was thinking of. I would point you to nearly every nation in the world with whom we have relations, treating us with a contempt we little deserve, and should no longer calmly brook. I would take you to the western coast of Mexico, where your consuls are kicked about, and your citizens imprisoned; or to the Gulf stream, where your merchant shipping is fired upon weekly by a supercilious rival with impunity; or I would carry you even to China, where the pagan tramples your starry flag under foot, and tears it into shreds before the eyes of your consul, and burns the property of your citizens or confiscates it to his own uses. I would carry you to Holland, where your chargé d'affaires points to the dictionary for the Dutch minister to find the signification of an English word he will not pronounce, but is ordered to write, to sustain a reclamation which was made absolute by an American Administration, yet has been, so far, treated with contempt. I would point to Spain, with whom not one case has ever been brought to a settlement, notwithstanding the Ostend manifesto and the Cincinnati platform. I would bid you listen to the cry borne on every breeze from American citizens in every part of the globe, asking this Government for protection in their lawful pursuits; and then I would remind you that this has been delayed, under one excuse or another, by our politicians, until every intelligent man who has been abroad laughs derisively at the idea that the flag of the United States is a safe shelter either from insult or outrage.

Believe me, sir, this picture is not overdrawn. Our tendencies are not to the zenith, but to the nadir of national efficiency and vigor, and the voice which I utter will find an affirmative response from every American who has visited other countries, and knows the reputation we are acquiring, not in our own estimation, but in that of foreign nations. This thing ought to be rectified. It must be rectified. Sooner or later it will be rectified; for sooner or later the people of the country will wake up to the fact that if you, gentlemen of the Democratic party, who have now the responsibilities of administration—the Executive, the Senate, and House in your hands—are not equal to the task, it will be the duty of the American people to commit their welfare and their destiny to American hands.

Mr. GOODE. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BURNETT. I ask my colleague on the committee to yield to me for a few minutes only. My colleague from Kentucky has undertaken to give a history of the Louisville riots. I mean to go into the facts, and to give a correct history of them, according to my understanding.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the committee will go on with the business before it.

Mr. BURNETT. I will not occupy more than ten minutes. I appeal to my colleague on the committee to yield me the floor, as an act of justice to me personally.

Mr. GOODE. I will; for five minutes only.

Mr. BURNETT. Well; I will take five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope gentlemen on the other side will permit me to be heard, for I assure them I have no purpose except that the truth of history may be vindicated.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman has had his hour, more or less. I object to it positively.

Mr. BURNETT. I am entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] is entitled to the floor for one hour, if he chooses to occupy it; and he yields to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT,] who now occupies it.

Mr. BURNETT. I want the attention of the committee for a few moments.

Mr. MORGAN. I want to know when the gentleman's [Mr. GOODE's] hour commenced?

The CHAIRMAN. The time occupied by both gentlemen from Kentucky comes out of the time to which he was entitled.

Mr. GOODE. How long have I now?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-three minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. I now hope that gentlemen will allow me to proceed. I intend to go into the discussion of the facts. I do not controvert any statement that my colleague makes of his own knowledge; but I tell him, and I tell the committee, that the evidence is not as he has detailed it here to-day. My colleague says that the foreigners had banded together for the purpose of taking the polls in the city of Louisville. The mere statement of the fact that the American party had a majority of over two thousand votes in Louisville, is a sufficient refutation of the idea that a minority would band together against such odds for the purpose of taking the polls.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The gentleman's colleague says that he understands that the riots in the city of Louisville originated from the banding together of foreigners—not for the purpose of taking the polls.

Mr. BURNETT. I have stated the majority which the American party had in that city. I will now also state that they had control of every branch of the city government; and that the Democrats of the city of Louisville, one week prior to that election, implored the city authorities, by every consideration that should have moved men, to take measures for the maintenance of order on the day of election. If the Democratic citizens of Louisville had been permitted to exercise their rights of suffrage, my colleague would not have come to this House with anything like the majority he had. I speak from the testimony of gentlemen of as high respectability as any in the city of Louisville; and I have their testimony as published.

I refer to the testimony of such men as the Hon. James Speed, Mayor of the city; Hon. George A. Caldwell, formerly a member of this House; F. S. J. Ronald, present postmaster of the city of Louisville; Hon. W. P. Thomasson, formerly a member of this House; Joseph B. Stewart, Esq., and fifty-two other sworn witnesses, citizens of Louisville of the highest respectability. I want my colleague to understand distinctly that every statement I make in connection with this riot is based upon the facts published at the time—the well-authenticated facts—verified by such high testimony as I have alluded to.

Now, let me call the attention of the committee to another fact. My colleague says that men were collected in houses with muskets in their hands. I deny the truth of that statement, and I deny that there is proof of any such fact.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Does my colleague mean to say that there was no evidence to that point?

Mr. BURNETT. I will try and make myself intelligible. The witnesses to whom I have alluded—among them the former sheriff of Louisville, now the postmaster of that city—have published the facts over their signatures. As to the burning of Quinn's row, my colleague says there were arms there. What does the evidence show? I tell you, gentlemen, that if the history of that 6th day of August in the city of Louisville were written, it would constitute such a record as ought to provoke the special judgment of Heaven upon it, as in the case of Sodom and Gomorrah.

There were two Irishmen walking along the street. They had to cross Main street. There they met a band marching under what they called the American flag, with the inscription upon it of "Americans shall rule America." The cry was immediately raised by this band of murderers and assassins, "Move them! move them!" These two men, seeing the danger, fled, and were pursued by this gang of ruffians. One of the men reached the house in Quinn's row, and sought shelter in it, when the doors were shut against his pursuers. The murderers burst the doors open. They went into the house, and, as the proof shows, after pillaging it in some instances, they took men who had remained at home the whole day for fear of violence, and who had not attempted to vote, and, with their wives and children imploring for them the pity of their assassins, they tore them from their families, murdered some of them in the house, and permitted others to escape, that they might be shot down as they ran off. Not only men were murdered, but the proof shows that women and children were lost by reason of the burning of the houses; for let it be recollected that after the assassins had looted their thirst for blood, they applied the torch of the incendiary to the houses, and destroyed them by fire. The old man (Quinn) who owned the houses had, on account of fear, kept away from the polls, and concealed himself in the third story of one of them, with the hope that there he would be free from the scent of the blood-thirsty villains who gratified their brutal taste on that day by the murder of innocent victims. As the pursuers of the men who escaped for shelter to his row came upon his premises he attempted to escape, and was handed a frock to disguise himself as a woman. Thus disguised, he fled from his house; but the character of a woman was not respected by the fiends—it mattered not to them what sex fell by their brutal hands—and they murdered him as he fled. This is a correct history of the burning of Quinn's row.

My colleague says that these houses of the old man Quinn were a perfect magazine. He is mistaken. THE PROOF SHOWS NO SUCH FACT. When the ruins of the burnt district were examined, it is true that the remains of some old muskets were found. But the evidence shows conclusively that they were not loaded, and that they were not in a condition to be used, even if it had been desired, for the purposes of warfare.

Mr. Chairman, I will now state another fact in connection with this old man Quinn, which will show his peaceable and inoffensive disposition. But a short time before he was murdered, and his property destroyed, a gang of these Know Nothing fiends had stoned his house, broken in his windows, and filled the whole neighborhood with terror. He, being a peaceable and quiet citizen, appealed to the Mayor of the city to protect him against such outrages. The prayer of the old man was disregarded, and the sequel is a bloody commentary upon the criminal negligence which has characterized the Know Nothing officials every where, in refusing the means to protect the public peace when aggressions upon it by the ruffians connected with their own party were calculated to promote their success.

My colleague speaks of explosions. There were none except of the guns in the hands of these outlaws, who were shooting down quiet and inoffensive citizens.

Strange, Mr. Chairman, if these riots were produced by the "combination of foreigners," as stated by my colleague, that but one Know Nothing was killed on that day, and he by his own friends, who accidentally killed him by mistake. I referred to the two men who were crossing Main street, one of whom fled into Quinn's row. The other fled in an opposite direction, and was pursued. He made his escape through a store. One of these assassins followed him into the house, and in coming out was mistaken for the Irishman, and was killed. This was the only member of the American party who was killed.

I will not detain the committee with a detailed statement of all the outrages and murders which were committed on that day. It would require more than an hour to do so. If my colleague wants the facts, I will furnish him the testimony which I have here, and which I would read if I had time.

Mr. Chairman, the Know Nothing police of Louisville on that day made no effort to check the riots. They arrested none of their own partisan friends, who had commenced them. The surviving victims of the fiendish assailants were the peculiar objects of their official vigilance. They seized one man, nearly dead, and were carrying him to jail. He could not walk, and had to be lifted by the police. In this condition he was followed, whilst in the hands of the police, by a gang of outlaws, one of whom kept sticking him with a pitch-fork, to make the feeble man, to use his own terms, "walk."

Mr. Chairman, to show that there could not have been any "foreign combination" to incite these riots, I will state that at the election in the May previous, at which clerks, sheriffs, &c., were elected, the adopted citizens were then driven from the polls. This intimidated them from attempting to vote at the election subsequently, and they declared that they would not vote in the succeeding election unless they could have the assurance of protection from the city authorities. This determination was represented by the Democratic party to the Know Nothing officials, and urged upon them as a reason why they should take some steps to secure a fair election; but a deaf ear was turned to their entreaties, and the riots followed.

The Louisville Journal gave public notice of these intended riots. When George D. Prentice goes to the courts above he will have to bear his proportion of the blood shed in Louisville on that 6th day of August. Some days before, he published an editorial of the most incendiary character, in which he clearly and fully foreshadowed the scenes that followed on that 6th day of August. He stated that Americans must vote, but that foreigners would have to be very careful not to jostle the elbows or tread on the toes of Americans, or words to that effect. I have not the paper; but the article was of a most incendiary character.

Mr. Caldwell says he went to the polls on the morning of the 6th of August, before breakfast; that he voted; that a peaceable, quiet, and inoffensive German citizen, who had lived in Louisville for a number of years, came to the polls with a Democratic ticket in his hand, when there was immediately raised the cry of "move him!" "move him!" They drove him into the courthouse. He was compelled to make his escape from that place—fled for his life—was overtaken, and brutally beaten.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to go any further into the history of these riots. It is a record of horror, to which, as a Kentuckian, I refer with regret. It has cast a blot upon the history of Louisville which time can never efface. It has done more to check her prosperity and growth than any conceivable calamity which could have befallen her. Before the introduction of Know Nothingism within her limits she was marching, with rapid strides, on the high road to prosperity. She is now, with the incubus which its fruits has imposed upon her, struggling to regain the ground which she has, on account of it, lost. Many years of time she will require to recover that which she once had, but has now lost, by the curse which the initiation of this party visited upon her.

Mr. Chairman, I stated, in the offset of this discussion, that it was not my intention to go into the question as to what party was responsible for these riots. My colleague, by his statement of their history, forced a truthful investigation of them upon me. I have given the history, so far as I could, within the short time allotted to me. I will now say to my colleague that, whenever he may desire to go into an investigation, to ascertain the proper responsibility for these riots, I am ready to meet him.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. The House, in committee, is acting under a special order upon the District of Columbia. Now my point of order is that this debate is not pertinent to the bill under consideration, and therefore not in order.

Several MEMBERS. Too late for that now.

Mr. GOODE. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of going into the House to close debate upon this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. HOPKINS) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly Senate bill (No. 99) to amend the "Act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind," approved February 16, 1857, and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do not pass.

Also, that the committee had had under consideration the bill of the House (No. 248) to regulate the municipal elections in the city of Washington, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GOODE. The bill which has been reported back from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is for making the blind see and making the deaf hear melody. I hope it will be the pleasure of the House to put it upon its passage, and I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GOODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION BILL—CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. GOODE. I now move that the usual resolution to close debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon House bill (No. 243) to regulate the municipal elections in the city of Washington, in five minutes after the committee shall have resumed the consideration of the same.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. GOODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LANDS OF THE CHRISTIAN INDIANS.

A message was received from the Senate by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, requesting the House to return to the Senate the bill (S. No. 323) to confirm the title of the reservation held by the Christian Indians, and to provide a permanent home for said Indians.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move that the bill be returned to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I understand this bill has been referred to a committee. I suppose it will be reported back without further action.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes it will be the duty of the committee to return the bill.

Mr. GREEN WOOD. The Committee on Indian Affairs instructed me this morning to report the bill back to the House, and I shall hand it over to the Clerk of the House to be returned to the Senate.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. GOODE moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the WASHINGTON MUNICIPAL ELECTION BILL.

Mr. GOODE. I will not detain the House with any speech. I desire to get along with the business.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. There was something which fell from the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT,] and, as I am a member of the American party, I propose to answer it—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I insist on the point of order, that the gentleman's remarks are not germane to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the remarks are not in order. It is in order to refer to a riot which may have resulted from former laws, but it is not in order to go into the organization of parties. Nor do the persons who participated and were killed or wounded in a riot form a proper subject of debate on this bill.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, to the amendment of Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, requiring a residence of two years after naturalization, and it was rejected.

The question occurred on the amendment of Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, requiring one year's residence after naturalization.

Mr. BINGHAM. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose to amend what is proposed to be stricken out?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question will be first taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken on Mr. MARSHALL's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. BINGHAM. I submit the following amendment:

Add at the end of first section:

Provided further, That any citizen of the United States resident within said District for temporary purposes only, or who shall have the intention to remove from said District when he shall have performed any temporary engagement within said District, or upon the termination of such engagement, or shall have voted within one year next preceding any election in said District, at which such resident offers to vote, in any other Territory or State, shall not be deemed a resident citizen within the meaning of this act: And provided further, That upon the challenge of any citizen of said District, any person offering to vote at any election therein, shall be required to answer upon oath, to be administered by one of the commissioners of said election, whether such challenged person is residing in said District for temporary purposes, whether such person intends to remove from said District when any engagement of such person so challenged shall have been determined or performed, and whether such challenged person has, within one year next preceding such challenge, voted at any election in any other Territory or State; and, if any person shall knowingly swear falsely in the premises, he shall, upon indictment and conviction thereof, before any court competent to try the same, be adjudged guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury, and be punished accordingly.

Mr. REAGAN. I have an amendment which comes in before that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Texas that his amendment will be in order after this is disposed of.

Mr. BINGHAM. This amendment, as the committee will observe, makes no distinction between a native and naturalized citizen, and is, therefore, not subject to the objection which was urged in reference to the amendment to the first section offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. My amendment treats all citizens alike. The object of the amendment is to guard the polls in this District against the fraudulent votes of those who are here only for temporary purposes, and at the time are resident citizens of other States or Territories. The amendment, as the committee will also observe, excludes from the privilege of voting at any election within this District, all persons who are resident here, but who have, within one year next preceding the election, voted in any other Territory or State. I submit that it is a provision well calculated to guard and protect the elections in this District, irrespective of party; and, so far as it may accomplish that end, it will save the city from those disreputable riots which have heretofore disgraced the city, and which, in my judgment, have resulted more from attempts to cast fraudulent and illegal votes than from any other cause whatever. At all events, whether it will have the beneficial effect of preventing violence or not, one thing is certain and clear: that, if carried out faithfully and honestly, it will guard the people here against illegal and spurious votes.

Mr. Chairman, there is another point to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. This amendment does not leave the guardianship of the ballot-box exclusively to the commissioners of election, to whatever party they may belong, but confers upon the bona fide citizens of the District, irrespective of his political opinions, the right to challenge any man who offers to vote, and who, at the time, is believed not to be a bona fide resident of the District.

I think that the amendment ought to be adopted, for the reason that it excludes that class of persons who are here for temporary purposes, and have the intention to leave as soon as these purposes are determined, whether it be one year, or two, or five years, and who, at the time, are resident citizens of another Territory or State. Absence from a State, for temporary purposes only, does not deprive a citizen of his right to vote upon his return. I am sure that that is the law of my own State, and I do not hesitate to say that it is the law of every State of the Union. For example: if a citizen of Ohio, now domiciled in Ohio, comes here and undertakes any temporary engagement, to continue for three or five years, with the intention to return to that State when that engagement shall be determined, during its progress he can go to Ohio and vote, even though he may have been continuously absent from that State, and temporarily resident here, for more than one year. I doubt not they have the same law in Virginia and Maryland, the States adjoining this District. The object I had in view in framing this amendment was to meet the objection which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] so eloquently urged here, at such great length, and with such great force, against what he supposed would be the legal effect of the bill as it stood, in allowing mere temporary residents to vote down the permanent, bona fide citizens of the District, and control the election. I trust, sir, the amendment will meet the approbation of the committee, and will be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. GOODE. I must express the hope that the House will disregard the amendment, and reject it. It is not to be expected that any person having the authority to decide, will decide that a man may vote in the District of Columbia upon a residence mala fide obtained. Who come here expecting to return to their native State? None of the clerks in the city of Washington come here expecting to go back to their former homes. They come here expecting to make this their permanent home, so long as they can get a position which will enable them to live; and when they change their residence, they are just as likely to go to the western world as to their original homes. To exclude these men who abandon their former homes, would be like excluding from the right of suffrage every man in any State who should move from one county to another in the same State, or who has not a permanent interest in the soil.

The argument of the gentleman from Maryland went to the extent that none but holders of real estate could be regarded as permanent citizens of the District of Columbia; because his argument excludes even all those who have personal estate to a large amount. A man might have $30,000 worth of property in his house, and pay taxes upon it all, and yet, by the gentleman's argument, be excluded because that property is personal. If you intend to do justice between man and man, and that a man shall come here and exercise a just influence in the community in which he has fixed his residence, and where he intends to live as long as he has the means of living, you will allow the clerks to vote, because they are just as permanent as any other citizens in this District, except the holders of real estate; and I presume no part of the House will insist that the right to vote shall be confined to the holders of real estate. Such, I admit, was once the law of Virginia, but it has been condemned by the good sense of the country, and the country has adopted residence as the evidence of a common interest in the community in which persons live, and have dispensed with the evidence of holding real estate, as a qualification for a voter.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. BINGHAM; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to amend the first section by striking out in lines nine and ten the words, "vagrants, paupers, felons, and persons non compos mentis excepted;" and insert, in lieu thereof, the words:

Persons who may have been declared vagrants and paupers by the proper authorities, and those who may have been so convicted of felonies, and persons non compos mentis excepted.

By the terms of this bill every white male resident of the city, of twenty-one years of age, &c., vagrants, paupers, felons, and persons non compos mentis excepted, is allowed to vote. The object of my amendment is to disembarass the duties of the judges or inspectors of elections. The terms of the bill, as it now stands, may lead the managers of elections to conclude that they are to be the judges, upon facts presented to them at the time of the election, as to who are vagrants, paupers, felons, &c. Such a course might lead to very great delay. If an individual were challenged at the polls on being incompetent to vote, because he was a vagrant, pauper, or felon; if there was no separate tribunal to take cognizance of that question, the managers of the election would necessarily have to suspend the election until they could adjudicate and pass in a hurried, ex parte manner, upon the fact. If my amendment is adopted, instead of embarrassing the managers of the election with determining the question, the matter will be devolved upon a separate tribunal. It designates a class of persons upon whom the managers may pass judgment immediately—persons who have been declared paupers, &c., by authorities who have the power to pass upon that question. That will disembarass the managers on the day of election, and leave them free to proceed with the election.

Mr. GOODE. I suppose no person will be held to be a felon until he has been convicted of felony, or to be non compos mentis until a commission has so pronounced; and as to paupers and vagrants, it is to be presumed that they are in the poor-house.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I propose to offer an amendment, to insert, after the word "years," in the ninth line, the words "not exercising or claiming the right of suffrage elsewhere," so that it will read: "from and after the passage of this act, every free white male resident of the city of Washington, of the age of twenty-one years, not exercising or claiming the right of suffrage elsewhere," &c.

Mr. GOODE. I would accept that if I had the power.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I hope, sir, the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will not be adopted by the committee. I think it violates rights of citizens of this country in this: there is a compound relation upon the citizens of this country—one to the Federal Government, the other to the State government. This District being the property of the Government, and its actual existence, when we come into it we should be entitled to all the rights of other citizens of the United States—whilst here the obligations are to the Federal Government, and the protection should come from her; when the citizen is in the State of his domicile, the relation is due immediately to the State. Then the illustration of citizens of State and State is not in point. If, then, I am by the laws of the Federal Government compelled to pay a tax here, I should instantly be allowed to enjoy the elective franchise; and residence is not requisite, and should not determine my right to vote. I am sure, even, I may be a citizen of the United States, having a domicile in one of the States, and if I have resided as a citizen in one of the States of this Union for twenty years, I have been during that time a citizen of the United States, though not of each one of the States. If, then, I am brought to Washington in the performance of public duties, intending to return to my domicile in the State of my residence, if I am taxed here, I should be allowed to vote, because I am a resident citizen of the United States of as long duration as my residence in the State. Take the President. He comes here in the performance of public duties, and has only lost temporarily his State residence, but has in no wise affected his status to the General Government; and if taxed should be allowed to vote.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1st Session.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 26, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 149.

Mr. READY. That is all true; but I want to know what taxes he has to pay here?

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I do not know that he pays any. I took him as an illustration. If, however, he is required to pay a tax under the corporate law, he should be allowed to vote, although a citizen of Pennsylvania. When he votes in Pennsylvania, he votes in his State capacity; now he votes in his Federal character.

The amendment proposed by Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, was agreed to.

Mr. COLFAX. I move to strike out the proviso to the first section of the bill, which is as follows:

Provided, That in all cases where the person so otherwise entitled and offering to vote shall not have been resident of the particular ward in which he is resident bona fide upon the day of election for the space of one month immediately previous thereto, then such person shall be entitled to vote in the ward in which he last previously resided.

I think that proviso initiates a new policy, which is unwise. The object of all our election laws which require a residence for a certain length of time in the ward or county in which he offers to vote, is to foster and promote permanency of residence. I do not know how it may be in the States adjacent to this District; but I know that in the northwestern States—with which I am more familiar—if a person leaves one county and goes to another, and has not obtained a residence in the county to which he has removed, he cannot go back to his original county and vote at the election; and it is not wise, after a man has removed from one ward to another, that he should be allowed to go back and vote in his original ward for Mayor, aldermen, school officers, assessors, and all the officers, not only of the city, but of that ward in which he has no residence or interest. I hope the proviso will be stricken out.

Mr. GOODE. I only want the House to understand what will be the effect of the amendment before they undertake to pass upon it. According to this bill, if a man removes from one ward to another, he must reside in the new ward thirty days before he is allowed to vote. He cannot acquire the right to vote in the new ward without a thirty days' residence. By the amendment he would forfeit his right to vote in the ward from whence he came, and though he may have performed his duties faithfully as a citizen, though he may have paid his capitation tax for the support of schools, though he may have paid his tax upon his personal property in accordance with the provisions of law, though he may have done every duty which any voter could perform, yet he is deprived of the right of suffrage, because he has removed into another ward and has not resided there for thirty days prior to the election.

Mr. COLFAX. I ask the gentleman from Virginia whether it is fair that a man who has left the ward in which he has resided, and who does not intend to return there within the year following should have the right to vote, for instance, for alderman for that ward, when he is to have no interest in the representation whatever?

Mr. HILL. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, so that the latter clause of the section shall read:

And that from and after the passage of this act every free white male resident of the city of Washington, of the age of twenty-one years, (vagrants, paupers, felons, and persons non compos mentis excepted.) who shall have resided in the city one year immediately preceding the day of election, and who shall be a citizen of the United States at the time he offers to vote, and shall have paid the school tax and all taxes on personal property due from him, shall be entitled to vote in the ward of which he shall be on the day of election, and shall have been for thirty days preceding a bona fide resident, for Mayor, members of the Board of Aldermen, and Common Council, register, collector, surveyor, assessors, and such other officers as may hereafter be made elective: Provided, That in all cases where the person so otherwise entitled and offering to vote shall not have been resident of the particular ward in which he is resident bona fide upon the day of election for the space of one month immediately previous thereto, then such person shall be entitled to vote in the ward in which he last previously resided, for Mayor only.

The Committee will readily perceive the effect of this amendment, and the analogy between the city and State elections, where persons removing from one county to another, are not, until they shall have resided there the required time, permitted to vote for members of the Legislature, but are permitted to vote for State officers. Here I propose that when a voter shall have removed from one ward to another, until the thirty days have expired, he shall not be allowed to vote for alderman, but that he shall be allowed to vote for Mayor of the city.

Mr. COLFAX. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia. There is a fitness in allowing men under such circumstances to vote for Mayor; but there is not in allowing them to vote for aldermen.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Indiana, was to strike out the proviso; and that of the gentleman from Georgia to perfect it. Unless the gentleman from Indiana prefers to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, the question will first be upon the proposition to amend, and then upon the motion to strike out.

Mr. COLFAX. Let separate votes be taken.

Mr. MORSE, of Maine. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, [Mr. GOODE,] whether, when a voter removes from one ward to another, there is not some law or regulation now in force in the District by which he can secure his right to vote in the ward where he resides.

Mr. GOODE. The regulations under the present law are very much the same as—I believe precisely identical with—those in this bill.

Mr. MORSE, of Maine. I do not understand all the laws regulating the rights of voters in this city, and do not understand the object of sending voters back to their old places of residence until they have resided thirty days in the ward to which they last removed. In the eastern cities a man is never a voter in a ward where he has no residence, and never ought to be one. On removal from one ward to another, he at once, by certificate, or in some other form, establishes his right to vote in the ward to which he has removed.

Mr. GOODE. I rise to a question of order. The debate has exhausted itself upon this amendment; and I ask that the vote be taken upon it.

Mr. MORSE, of Maine. I am opposing the amendment.

Mr. GOODE. I thought the gentleman was arguing in favor of the amendment.

Mr. MORSE, of Maine. I rose for the purpose of trying to draw some information from the committee which reported this bill on the subject to which it relates. The committee will judge with what success, with the light before us. I am in favor of the amendment and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. GOODE. The gentleman purported to be speaking in opposition to the amendment and now he says he is in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. PHILLIPS. As the committee is not likely to adopt any amendment to the bill, and as they are consuming a good deal of time upon it, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask that the resolution which was adopted by the House, closing debate upon this bill, be read. It requires the committee to vote upon all amendments pending, or which may be offered to the bill before it is reported to the House.

Mr. COLFAX. There is another point of order which I wish to make on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which is, that the vote must be first taken upon my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the 119th rule, a motion to strike out the enacting clause takes precedence of a motion to amend.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Let the resolution for terminating debate be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The resolution is in the usual form.

Mr. GROW. I call for the reading of the 136th rule.

Mr. PHILLIPS. My object in making the motion was to save time; but, as I am not likely to accomplish the object by these means, I withdraw the motion.

The question being upon Mr. COLFAX's amendment,

Mr. BURNETT called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BURNETT and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to strike out the second section of the bill, which reads as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be allowed to vote at any election as aforesaid unless he shall have been returned on the books of the corporation of said city as subject to a school tax; and it shall be the duty of the register of said city, in addition to the names of persons so returned by the assessors of said city, upon satisfactory proof under oath, to be administered by some justice of the peace of the county of Washington, that the name of any such person has been accidentally or willfully omitted from said books, to place the same thereon at any time after he shall have received said books from the assessors, up to ten days before the said election; and in case any such person shall be absent from the city at said time, or under twenty-one years of age, and his name in consequence thereof be omitted from said books, then upon his return, or becoming of age, at any time after the day of registration, and before the day of said election, and upon satisfactory proof thereof made as aforesaid, the said register shall place the name of such person so returning on said books. And if any person shall knowingly swear falsely in the premises, he shall, upon indictment and conviction thereof before any court competent to try the same, be adjudged guilty of willful and corrupt perjury, and punished accordingly.

Mr. Chairman, taxation and representation should invariably go together. A dollar school tax upon a laborer who has no children, and can derive no advantage from the system which he is called upon to support, is oppressive; and no man's right of suffrage should be made dependent on the payment of such tax.

Mr. WINSLOW. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I want a vote on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will see by the 119th rule that it is provided that a motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend; and if carried shall be considered equivalent to its rejection. Therefore, the motion to strike out the enacting clause, will take precedence of the gentleman's motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does the Chair entertain the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. He does.

Mr. GOODE. Does the gentleman appeal?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman does appeal.

Mr. GOODE. The gentleman may appeal.

[Laughter.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. And I intend to do it. The motion is in direct conflict with the resolution passed closing debate on this bill. I demand tellers on the appeal.

Tellers were not ordered.
Mr. SEWARD. I move that the committee rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative; there being, on a division—ayes 92, noes 26.

The motion to strike out the enacting clause was agreed to; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

LITTLE FALLS BRIDGE.

The next bill on the Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 274) to reimburse the corporation of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, a sum of money advanced towards the construction of the Little Falls bridge.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What was done with the preceding bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What right have the committee to do that, when, by striking out the enacting clause, the bill was rejected?

Mr. HILL. I move that the committee rise. The question was taken; and the motion was disagreed to.

The Clerk read the bill before the committee in extenso. It appropriates the sum of $—— to repay the corporation of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, all moneys heretofore advanced by the said corporation for and towards the construction of the bridge over the Potomac, at the point known as the Little Falls. And the said corporation of Georgetown, by accepting the provisions of this act, shall waive and surrender all further claim or demand on the Government of the United States, founded on any advancement of money or other thing towards the object herein specified to any other purpose whatsoever. This act to commence and be in force from and after its passage.

The report states that in March, 1853, $30,000 was appropriated by Congress for the construction of a bridge over the Potomac river, at a point known as the Little Falls, and the work was placed in process of construction, under the direction of George Thom, captain in corps of topographical engineers. In the fall of 1853, when the work had been prosecuted near to completion, the appropriation was found to be exhausted—the sum of $30,000 having been expended—and it became necessary to suspend operations until other funds could be procured applicable to the object. It was supposed that several months must pass before an additional appropriation could be expected from Congress; and the abandonment of the work, in an unfinished condition, at the approach of winter, must expose it to serious injury, while its suspension would involve a necessity for a sale of the stock on hand, by which the Government would suffer a heavy loss. To avoid these evils, the officer in charge, on consultation with the Secretary of the Interior, applied to the corporate authorities of Georgetown to advance $5,000, which would enable him to continue his operations, and carry forward the bridge to a condition in which it might be used for travel during the then following winter. This proposition was acceded to, and, by several acts of the corporation, the sum of $5,800 was placed to the credit and subject to the order of Captain Thom, to be expended in the construction of the Little Falls bridge, his assurance being given, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, that the amount should be reimbursed to the corporation of Georgetown when the further appropriation should be made by Congress. It also appears that some lien on the stock on hand was executed in favor of the corporation of Georgetown, as a security for the reimbursement of the amount advanced; but it is believed that nothing was realized by the corporation from this lien, the entire stock having been applied to the uses of Government. In August, 1854, Congress appropriated a further sum of $15,000 for completing the bridge; but a serious accident had befallen it, which created a necessity for the appropriation of a large sum, and the corporation of Georgetown postponed its claim for immediate payment, unwilling to delay the completion of the work; accordingly, the sum of $13,800, part of the appropriation of $15,000, was applied towards the completion of the bridge, leaving a balance of $1,200, which was applied towards the payment of the sum of $5,800, leaving the sum of $4,600 due to the corporation of Georgetown.

Mr. GOODE. I move to fill the blank in the bill with the sum of $4,600.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to reduce the amount of the amendment one dollar. I am opposed to this bill entirely. From the reading of the report, it seems that this sum has been expended for the especial benefit of the city of Georgetown; and that some twenty or thirty thousand dollars besides have been paid by the Government to build this bridge—a bridge in which the people of Georgetown have more interest than the people of Washington, and a great deal more interest than the remainder of the people of the United States, who are called upon to pay this money. I think we have gone quite far enough in making appropriations for this District. We are not only paying their municipal expenses, but we are constructing and maintaining all their bridges. I deny our right to appropriate money for these objects. These people should be authorized, as are other people in the country, to defray their own expenses for these purposes. I hope the bill will not be passed.

Mr. GOODE. I merely wish to say that this bridge is situated a mile or two above Georgetown, within the District of Columbia. It is a work which was undertaken by act of Congress. Over it the city of Georgetown had no control. Congress made an appropriation for the original construction of the bridge, and we subsequently appropriated $5,000 more to complete it. The appropriation being exhausted, the city of Georgetown loaned the money in order to provide against injury to the structure already finished. There is no pretense that the money has been paid.

Mr. KELSEY. My opposition to the bill is that this improvement has been made out of the national Treasury for the benefit of the city of Georgetown. This portion at least should be a charge to that city.

Mr. GOODE. What right has the gentleman to charge this against Georgetown without their consent? Who does not know that Georgetown did not undertake originally the construction of that bridge? It is a bridge, not in Georgetown, but in the District of Columbia. Congress went on in the construction of this bridge, and under adverse circumstances the appropriation became exhausted, and Georgetown advanced $5,000 to enable the bridge to be completed. If ever there was a bill which ought to be passed, this is one.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understand that Congress, some years ago, appropriated $30,000 for the erection of a bridge across the Potomac at Little Falls, above Georgetown; and put it under the charge of a superintendent or engineer. He went on and expended the money that Congress had appropriated for the work; but that did not complete the bridge. Then the people of Georgetown, in the absence of all law, advanced the amount of $5,000, provided for in this bill, to the engineer. He then went on, and finished the bridge.

Mr. KELSEY. I think the report states that there was a subsequent appropriation of $15,000, in addition to the $30,000.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have never favored these appropriations exclusively for the benefit of this District, out of the Treasury of the United States, where they were not for the benefit of the Government, in consequence of the Government being located here; and, sir, I have not been in the habit of favoring appropriations of money to reimburse officers who, without law, have gone on and incurred expenses on their own responsibility. Upon these grounds, I shall not vote for this bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to furnish a little information which gentlemen over the way do not seem to possess. This bridge over the Potomac—not in Georgetown, nor within its jurisdiction—is one of those improvements which the Congress of the United States undertook many years ago to keep up. They have at different times appropriated $30,000, $15,000, and $75,000 for this bridge. The bridge is finished, and it is a magnificent monument to the justice and wisdom of Congress. During the progress of that work, Georgetown, having no more to do with it than the gentleman from Massachusetts, except that it is one of those great avenues which lead to her, appropriated, at the instance of the public agents—those agents whose conduct has been approved since by an appropriation of money—purely in the spirit of kindness and liberality, the sum necessary to put the work in such a condition as that it would not suffer injury until an appropriation could be made by Congress. Will you reimburse the money of which you have had the benefit, in a work for which you have since appropriated $75,000?

The question was taken on Mr. KELSEY's amendment; and it was rejected.

The question recurring upon the amendment of Mr. GOODE,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON and FERRON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 59.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

POLICE FOR WASHINGTON CITY.

The next bill in order on the Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 478) to establish an auxiliary guard for the protection of public and private property in the city of Washington, and repealing all acts heretofore passed in relation to that subject.

Mr. GOODE. That bill has already taken up much of the time of the House, and will probably give rise to a long debate. I hope it will be passed over.

There being no objection, the bill was passed over.

LIGHTING OF STREETS.

A bill (H. R. No. 540) for the lighting with gas several streets across the Mall, was next taken up.

The bill, which appropriates $6,400 for laying down gas pipes, and erecting gas lamps on Four-and-a-half, Seventh, and Twelfth streets, across the Mall, was laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

LAMP-POSTS FOR GEORGETOWN.

The committee next proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 27) relative to the erection of lamp-posts in Georgetown, District of Columbia.

The joint resolution appropriates $810 for the purpose of erecting thirty lamp-posts in Georgetown, from the western termination of Pennsylvania avenue, through Bridge and High streets.

Mr. KELSEY. I would like to know why it is that the General Government is to be charged with erecting lamp-posts in Georgetown? I supposed that some part of the municipal expenses was to be borne by the people of the District themselves; and it seems to me that this certainly ought to be.

Mr. DODD. This is merely to light Pennsylvania avenue.

The joint resolution was laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

RAILWAY ON PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

A bill (H. R. No. 541) in relation to a railway through Pennsylvania avenue, in the District of Columbia, was then taken up for consideration.

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to say that I was not present when the Committee for the District of Columbia authorized this bill to be reported; and I hope it will be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. GROW. If it is going to give rise to debate, I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that it be passed over on the Calendar.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. It is for the majority of the committee to decide what bill they will take up.

Mr. GOODE. I move to take up House bill No. 568.

Mr. KELSEY. I suppose there is no objection to the bill being reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not make that motion. I am willing that the bill shall be passed over informally.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that he will accomplish his purpose by moving that the bill be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. GARTRELL. I make that motion.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, I do not think we ought to do that, if we intend to present the bill in good faith. I have no hesitation in saying that upon general principles I am in favor of introducing railroads into the city. I believe that they are one of the institutions of the day, and should have consideration here as well as everywhere else.

A MEMBER. One of the "peculiar institutions." Mr. FLORENCE. Yes, sir; a peculiarly advantageous institution to the poorer classes of the people; and I want to know what good reason there is why it should not be introduced into the District of Columbia as well as anywhere else?

Mr. WINSLOW. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Virginia has moved to proceed to the consideration of bill No. 568, and I hold that it is competent for a majority of the committee to lay this bill aside and take up that one.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill having been taken up, the committee must make some disposition of it.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope the committee will indulge me for one moment. Here is a proposition made by a company for the purpose of running a railroad through Pennsylvania avenue to Georgetown.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the pending proposition relates to the priority of business, and, by the rules, is not debatable. No question relating to the priority of business is debatable.

Mr. BURNETT. I appeal to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE,] if he is friendly to the bill, to withdraw his motion.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I withdraw it.

Mr. BURNETT. I now move to take up the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I object. I propose to take up the business before the committee in order.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The Chair has decided that that is a matter for the committee to determine.

Mr. BURNETT. I submit to the committee to take up the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Does not that require general consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that a majority may control the matter.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I would like to hear the reasons of the gentleman from Kentucky why he desires the bill to be passed by.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is not in order; it is a question of priority of business.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I regard it as the most important bill that has been before the House to-day, and I think it ought to be acted on.

Mr. GARTRELL. I would like to know what has become of my motion, and whether it does not take precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky? My motion is to lay aside the bill, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do not pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that that motion is not in order, unless assented to generally by the committee.

Mr. GARTRELL. That it requires unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the other is a question in regard to priority of business.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. In making that suggestion, I do not desire to prejudice this bill in any way, for, with my colleague, [Mr. FLORENCE,] I am in favor of its passage. My desire is simply to expedite business, and to get up bills that are not objectionable.

The question was taken on Mr. BURNETT's motion to lay the bill aside and take up the next in order; and it was agreed to.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

The committee next took up a bill (H. R. No. 568) to organize a paid fire department in the District of Columbia.

The bill was reported, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act approved on the 2d of March, 1837, entitled "An act to organize the several fire companies in the District of Columbia," be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and that the corporate authorities of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, each for itself, and within its own limits, shall have, and are hereby, invested with full power to organize and regulate a paid fire department, and to make all necessary provisions for the prevention and extinguishment of fires; for the removal from any fire of suspicious persons, and of those who are disobedient to the regulations of said corporations; and for the removal of such property as may be necessary to be removed, or arrest the progress of any fire. And the said corporations shall also have power to aid, protect, and obtain obedience to the officers in the service of the fire department, and to protect the members thereof whilst in the discharge of their duties as firemen.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the organization of the paid fire department contemplated by this act, no volunteer fire company of any description shall exist or perform firemen's duties within the limits of either of the cities of Washington or Georgetown.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said paid fire department shall consist of at least four steam fire engines, with an appropriate outfit of men and horses; and that the sum of $15,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to aid the corporate authorities of the cities of Washington and Georgetown in the purchase, equipment, and maintenance of said engines.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $12,000 is also hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to aid the corporate authorities of the said cities in the establishment of a fire alarm and police telegraph.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all acts heretofore passed, inconsistent with this act, be, and they are hereby, repealed.

Mr. GOODE. I move as a substitute for that bill, the bill passed on the same subject by the Senate, as follows:

That the act approved 2d March, 1837, entitled "An act to organize the several fire companies in the District of Columbia," be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and that the corporate authorities of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, each for itself, and within its own limits, shall have, and are hereby, invested with full power to organize and regulate fire companies and a fire department, and to make all necessary provisions for the prevention and extinguishment of fires; for the preservation of order and the protection of property at any fire; for the removal from any fire of suspicious persons, and of those who are disobedient to the regulations of the said corporations; for the punishment, by fine and imprisonment, of such person or persons as, being present, refuse to assist and obey the commands of the proper officer in extinguishing any fire; and for the removal of such property as may be necessary to be removed to prevent or arrest the progress of any fire. And the said corporations shall also have power to aid, protect, and obtain obedience to the officers in command of the several fire companies, and to protect the members thereof whilst in the discharge of their duties as firemen.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the organization of the fire departments respectively contemplated by this act, no fire company of any description shall exist or act as such, and no company shall exist or perform firemen's duties under any other name or designation, within the limits of either of the cities of Washington or Georgetown, wherein such fire department shall have been organized, unless such company be a part of and attached to such fire department; and every person who shall be found acting in concert with others in violation of the provisions of this section shall, on conviction thereof in the criminal court of the said District, be sentenced to pay a fine not exceeding $100, and to be imprisoned in the county jail for a term not exceeding six months.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all the fire apparatus or other property, including engines, sections, hose, hose-carriages, reels, hook and ladder fixtures and carriages, engine houses, and all other property or implements appertaining to a fire department, which may be used by any fire company within the limits of either of the said cities, shall be vested in, belong to, and be under the exclusive control and direction of the corporate authorities of the city within whose limits such company exists.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every fire company which may be organized under the provisions of this act, and of any city ordinance enacted in conformity thereto, shall be composed of men not less than twenty-one years of age, who, upon enrolling themselves as members, shall be sworn to discharge their duties faithfully and impartially, and, having been thus qualified, each and every member, when on duty at a fire and wearing the insignia of his company, or when proceeding to or returning from a fire, shall possess the power and exercise the duties of a county constable in suppressing any affray or riot, and of apprehending, on view, and of delivering to a justice of the peace or other proper officer, all persons who shall disturb the peace or otherwise violate any of the laws of the cities or District aforesaid. And every active member of any fire company shall be exempt from militia duty in time of peace, and also from jury duty, so long as he shall continue an active member as aforesaid, and no longer; and of such membership a certificate, signed by the president and secretary of his fire company, shall be deemed and taken as sufficient evidence: Provided, That no more than seventy-five persons shall at the same time be exempted as members of any fully-equipped engine company, nor more than fifty persons shall at the same time be exempted as members of any suppression or hose company or hook and ladder company.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the members of every fire company organized and existing in pursuance of the provisions of this act, and of any city ordinance enacted in accordance herewith, shall have power to elect their own company officers, and to frame a constitution and by-laws, not to be inconsistent with this act, or any city ordinance as aforesaid; and each and every company shall have power to enforce obedience to its constitution and by-laws by fine and forfeiture, and to collect all such fines by warrant, to be issued by a justice of the peace in the city where such company belongs, in the name of said company; and the production before the justice of the journal or proceedings of such company, showing the record of the said fine or fines, together with a certificate of the president of the company, attested by its secretary, that the person so fined has been fined for disobedience to the constitution or by-laws (as the case may be) of — fire company, in — city, shall be sufficient evidence for the magistrate to issue his warrant, and, after having the party before him, to enter up judgment and issue execution thereon. And every sum or sums of money collected under the authority of this act shall be paid over by the officer or other person collecting the same to the treasurer of the company, in the name of which the warrant shall have been issued or money collected; and upon such officer or other person failing to pay over the same, the said treasurer may recover the same by warrant or suit in his own name, for the use of the said fire company, in the same manner as private debts are now recovered by law.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That each and every fire company, organized and existing as aforesaid, shall provide a fund for the relief of such member or members of such company as shall receive any corporeal hurt or injury, or contract any disease at or in consequence of any fire, and be unable to provide medical aid, or whose family or families may be dependent upon his or their daily labor for support, and for the relief of the family or families of any member or members of such fire company who shall or may be killed at or die in consequence of any injury received or disease contracted at or in consequence of any fire; and whose family or families may have been dependent upon his or their daily labor for support; and the treasurer of the said company shall, after having paid all the expenses which the said company shall have lawfully incurred, pay over to the said fund the residue of all fines collected under the authority of this act: Provided, That if any member be expelled from his company he shall thereupon forfeit all the rights, privileges, and immunities granted by this act.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. The reason of the Committee for the District of Columbia reporting this bill as a substitute for the Senate bill was, because the Senate bill simply proposed to give the corporation certain powers over the fire department as it now exists. In the opinion of the Committee for the District of Columbia, the present fire department is surrounded by so many evils, which are almost incorrigible, that no system of legislation can be adopted which could correct the evils inherent in the fire department of the city; and, therefore, the committee propose to give the corporation power to establish a paid fire department, and for Congress to aid them to a certain extent. Within the last few years, the Federal Government has invested an immense sum of money in public buildings in this city—buildings as large as any in the world—nominally fire-proof. It will occur, however, to every gentleman that he has heard of buildings, which were nominally as fire proof as this Capitol, being consumed by fire, or so seriously damaged as to render them utterly unfit for the purposes for which they were originally constructed. I believe that $15,000,000, at least, will be invested in this Capitol before it is finished. We propose not to establish this fire department, but to aid the corporation in doing so in the purchase of fire apparatus, &c. So far as I have conversed with citizens of the District, I have found that they desire the passage of some such measure as this. I do not pretend to speak of the bill as perfect; but the passage of some such measure is absolutely necessary for the purpose of getting rid of a disorderly organization, and putting the fire department exclusively under the corporation, and making it a branch of the police department.

Mr. STANTON. If I supposed that this bill was to entail any further expense to the Government, I should not be inclined to go for it. But I suppose all gentlemen are aware of the fact that the national Treasury now defrays a very large proportion of the expenses of the fire department of the city in procuring engine-houses, engines, &c.; and the idea of getting rid of being taxed for our proportion of the expense, is entirely out of the question. I have no doubt in the world that volunteer fire companies are the most complete schools of rowdism and disorganization and disorder and crime that can exist in any city. I believe all the populous cities in the country will find it necessary to abandon the system of volunteer fire companies, and establish paid fire departments. I believe, therefore, that this bill is decidedly preferable to that coming from the Senate, which contemplates the organization of volunteer fire departments. It will be found not more expensive, as I understand it. The system of a paid fire department has been resorted to by some of the cities in my own State. My colleague over the way, [Mr. GROESBECK,] from the Cincinnati district, can tell how it operates in his own city. Will my colleague from the Hamilton district tell me how that city finds the paid fire department to work in comparison with the volunteer fire companies?

Mr. GROESBECK. In answer to my colleague, I will say that the paid fire department in Cincinnati, at this time, is considered more economical than the old arrangement. I suppose that, perhaps, at this time, the fire department in Cincinnati is considered the best in the United States.

Mr. STANTON. That was my opinion about it. I have no doubt my colleague is correct. I supposed it to be more economical.

Mr. GROESBECK. It is more economical, in view of the amount of property it saves.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I would like, with the permission of the gentleman, to read an extract from the report of the board of underwriters of St. Louis upon the paid fire departments of Cincinnati and St. Louis, showing that it is more economical. They say:

"After an experience of five years, we have found the organization everything that could be expected of it or desired. It has given peace, quiet, and safety, for riot, lawlessness, and insecurity, and reduced the annual average losses by fire at least half a million dollars; saving us in the five years not less than two and a half million dollars—taking the preceding years for a comparison. These facts alone are sufficient to warrant its continuance; but beyond these we have the inestimable advantage it has been to the morals of the community, especially to the young, by breaking up entirely those great seminaries of vice and immorality—the engine halls of a volunteer department in a large city.

"As to the effect of the organization upon the insurance business, I believe I but utter the sentiment of my brother underwriters, in saying that it has been most beneficial. It has so materially diminished the losses, that the balance is largely on the right side of the ledger; and were the underwriters to day called upon to pay the whole expense of the department, I believe they would cheerfully do so—were it just and right to demand it of them, and their business would warrant it—rather than return to the old system, with its levies of black mail, riot, and arson.

"The expense of the paid department appears considerable, but we see all it is. In the old organization there was a constant series of levies upon the community for contributions, and persons well acquainted with these matters make no hesitation in asserting that the amount of money thus paid greatly exceeded the amount of the present direct tax; to say nothing of the immense saving of property, sufficient every year to pay the tax for five.

"There is another consideration connected with our paid department and steam fire engines. It is that of confining the fire, in almost every instance, to the building in which it originated, and, in the great majority of cases, to the single story of the building where it started. This I regard as one of the most important features of the present organization; for, except under the most unassailable cases, our city could never be subject to those sweeping conflagrations that have laid waste New York, Pittsburg, and St. Louis. So strongly are our citizens impressed with this opinion that, except in rare circumstances, goods are never removed from buildings adjoining one on fire, as the chance of damage is so slight that they prefer to let them remain, well knowing that a fire, whether in a cellar or at the top of a seven-story building, stands no chance before our firemen and the Latta steam fire engines."

Mr. STANTON. If the committee choose, pro forma, to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in committee, and let it go to the House, a test vote may then be taken between the two systems in the House. I think that would be a more satisfactory course.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope that course will be taken.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio one question before he takes his seat. He has said that the General Government pays a large proportion of the expenses of the paid fire department in this city. Now, I wish to ask him if he knows how much the Government pays?

Mr. STANTON. I do not. I only know that, in the annual appropriation bills, items are inserted for purchasing engines, and for all the contingent expenses of the fire department.

Mr. FLORENCE. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me a moment, I will state, as one item of the expenses, that, at the last Congress, we appropriated the sum of $5,000 for the erection of a building for the Franklin Fire Company; and my impression is, that all the fire apparatus of the city is owned by the Government. The fire organization of the city was originally made for the purpose of protecting Government property. - I will state here that the introduction of steam engines into the fire department of Philadelphia is becoming so very popular that even the volunteer fire companies in that city are supplying themselves with steam engines.

The amendment of Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania, was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

Senate bill (No. 152) to incorporate the Washington National Monument Society, was next taken up for consideration.

The bill provides that, for the purpose of completing the erection, now in progress, of "a great national monument to the memory of Washington at the seat of the Federal Government," Winfield Scott, Walter Jones, John J. Abert, James Kearney, Thomas Carberry, Peter Force, William A. Bradley, Phillip R. Fendall, Walter Lenox, Matthew F. Maury, and Thomas Blagden, (being the survivors of the persons mentioned in a certain grant, bearing the date of April 12, 1848, by James K. Polk, then President of the United States, in virtue of a joint resolution of Congress, approved the 31st of January, in the same year, of an authority to erect a monument to the memory of George Washington, on reservation number three in the city of Washington,) and also Archibald Henderson, Jonathan B. H. Smith, William W. Senton, Elisha Whittlesey, Benjamin Ogle Tayloe, and John Carroll Brent, and their successors, to be elected in the manner hereinafter directed, shall be, and are hereby, created a corporation and body-politic, by the name and style of "the Washington National Monument Society;" and contains the necessary details of incorporation to enable the society to prosecute its objects.

Mr. DODD. The Committee for the District of Columbia have directed me to offer two amendments to that bill. One to prevent the corporation from exercising banking powers, and the other making the stockholders individually liable for the debts of the corporation. I do not find the amendments at this moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the amendments will, by general consent, be allowed to go to the House with the bill, and that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. FLORENCE. Let it go with that understanding.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to say in my own behalf, in reference to the proposition to make the stockholders individually liable, that I hope no such provision will be adopted.

Mr. FLORENCE. It is a usual provision applied to corporations.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The cases to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers, are cases of corporations formed for the purpose of making money. This is to carry out a great national and patriotic object, and I think it would be doing great injustice to require the corporators to be held individually responsible for the debts of the corporation.

Mr. FLORENCE. The object is to prevent a perversion of the purposes for which the corporation is formed. The object is to prevent it from being made a money-making concern. I think it a very safe and proper amendment, and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. If the gentleman will show me an instance like this where such a provision is found, I will cheerfully waive my objection—one single instance in the history of this Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not being of the committee that has charge of this matter, as a matter of course, I know little or nothing of the history of this bill. Without some explanation, I think that it ought not to pass. If I understand it, it seems to be a transfer without the consent of the original proprietors or corporators or whatever company they may have had, whether resulting from an investment of money and labor, or a contingency growing out of their being the beneficiaries of some charity, whatever may be the nature of it, it would seem to be transferred without their consent to some new organization that is about to be incorporated here and to work, so far as an act of legislation can, a complete divestiture of that property. Such a provision ought not to receive the sanction of anybody. I move, therefore, that the bill be laid aside with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. GOODE. I will say, in vindication of the committee, that the trustees and the men who have made donations for this work, appeared before us and gave their consent to this proposed change.

The question was taken; and it was agreed to. So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do not pass.

ROADS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The next bill upon the Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 580) making an appropriation for the repair of certain roads in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. BURNETT. These roads lead by the insane asylum. Congress has heretofore made appropriations for them, which have been expended under the superintendence of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, but the amount was not sufficient. The levy court of the District of Columbia had a survey made of the roads, and has proposed that if Congress will appropriate a sufficient sum for the purpose of putting these roads in a passable condition, they will adopt them as public county roads. In drafting the bill, the committee will perceive that I provide that not one dollar shall be expended until there has been an order on the part of the court, making them public roads, and providing for keeping them up.

Mr. LETCHER. How have they been kept up heretofore?

Mr. BURNETT. By appropriations from the public Treasury. If you will refer to pages 7 and 8 of the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, it will be seen that he recommends the appropriation of this money. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If there are one or two bills which are left to go over until to-morrow, will they not come up to the exclusion of all other business?

The CHAIRMAN. That will be a question for the House to determine.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It had better be understood now.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I shall insist on the railroad bill being taken up to-morrow, if it is not disposed of to-day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope, then, that it will be disposed of to-day.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope that the committee will take up the railroad bill; and we will dispose of it in a short time.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. So much the better.

Mr. WARD obtained the floor.

Mr. LETCHER. With the permission of the gentleman from New York, I desire to inquire of the committee why there is no provision in this bill reserving to Congress the right to annul this charter? That has been usual in charters of this kind, and this is a pretty strong monopoly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman from Virginia whether, as this bill now stands, this company could be sued in a court of law?

Mr. LETCHER. I say they can be.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. They are not an incorporation.

Mr. LETCHER. Here is a privilege of the Government given away for a period of twenty-five years, and there is no privilege reserved to the Government to recall it for any abuse they may perpetrate. A gentleman calls my attention to the sixth section, which reads as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the penalty for a non-fulfillment of the obligations imposed upon said parties by this act shall be the forfeiture of all the privileges hereby granted."

Mr. WARD. That matter can be explained in the course of debate.

Mr. COX. With the permission of the gentleman from New York, I will move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Chairman, it is proper, perhaps, that I, having had charge of this bill in the committee of which I am a member, should make a few remarks upon the subject. I am not surprised at the prejudice which manifests itself in regard to this railroad. It existed for some time in the city of New York, after the first introduction of passenger railways; we have seen hostility arising wherever railroad enterprises of this kind have been projected. But completed and put in operation, we have found them beneficial, and of great public convenience. In the city of New York, where we have five or six railroads through our avenues, but a small part, if any, of our citizens would desire to have those tracks taken up, and the public convenience incommenced thereby. I recollect that when the Harlem railroad was laid down, there was great opposition to it; and a prejudice existed for a long time after it was finished and put in operation. But that prejudice arose from defects in the track which impeded other public travel. The improvements which have since been made in laying down tracks, by introducing the open groove rail placed upon a level with the pavement, has removed the impediments to other vehicles. Hostility has been removed, and there are now railroads in several of the principal avenues in the city of New York, and cars are running from the extreme upper to the lower portions of the city. They are of vast public benefit. They are not only a benefit as avenues of public travel, but it has been demonstrated that the city is benefited by bringing distant points near together, as it were. It has enhanced the value of property upon their routes. The Sixth and Eighth avenues, through which lines of railroads run, are flourishing avenues with business extending out two or three miles upon them, while the Seventh avenue adjoining, on which there is no railroad track, is far less thriving as far as business is concerned.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to inquire of the gentleman if the authorities of the city did not grant to a certain number of individuals the privilege of building a railroad in Broadway; and if the property-holders on that avenue did not apply for an injunction to prevent its being built; and if the court did not grant an injunction restraining the building of the road?

Mr. WARD. That is true in regard to Broadway. The objection in that case was, that Broadway was too narrow; though I think that was a mistaken objection. I will not argue that matter here. That was the reason of the hostility of some persons, who supposed the road would interfere with the travel of Broadway, as it is a great thoroughfare, and is constantly filled with carriages and omnibuses. But there is Chatham street, only thirty-three feet wide, in which two railroads are run, and still they do not incommode the public. This matter having been before the committee, I felt it my duty, being familiar somewhat with the system of railroads which are now extending into Brooklyn, Philadelphia, and other cities, to briefly address the committee.

If there is any improvement in the mode of travel, I can see no reason why Washington should not have the benefit of it as well as other cities. I am well satisfied that, if Congress should pass this bill, or any one that would authorize the laying down of a track, and the railroad should be completed, no member of this House would be likely to vote to have the track taken up or to repeal the law relative to it. The conveniences and benefit of such a railroad would be great, and the evidence in regard to two or three points stated in the report accompanying this bill demonstrates, I think very clearly, that the ordinary objections which have been made to railroads in cities are done away with; that they are great conveniences, and actually enhance the value of property in the city.

The railway, as a principle, has every argument in its favor; and if any valid objections can be made against them, as they are constructed, it is against such features as can be readily modified. The Harlem railway, in New York, was the first used for the local business of the city, in the carrying of passengers in small horse cars. It was not originally constructed for this purpose, and was laid with a rail of the ordinary pattern in use upon ordinary railways, and with a gauge of four feet eight and a half inches. The form of rail did not admit of a smooth surface or perfect connexion with the pavement, offering serious obstruction to the passage of ordinary vehicles.

When, subsequently, it was proposed to lay railways through the Sixth and Eighth avenues, this objection was most seriously urged. To avoid the difficulty, a rail of a groove pattern was adopted. This admitted a pavement laid close against both sides of the rail and even with its top, and removed, to a considerable extent, one very important objection. The groove is made shallow, wide, and flaring, so that the wheels of an ordinary vehicle will readily enter or leave it. To make the surface more perfect, square blocks were laid on each side of the rails, while the remainder was laid with the ordinary cobble stone. Successive improvements in the method of paving and in the form of rail have been made, until railways have, in that city, become an indispensable convenience. They have been adopted in Boston, Brooklyn, and Philadelphia; and the construction of new lines is in progress. It is not, however, to be said that they have been perfected, or that all the objections to them have ceased, although in the city of New York, as the longitudinal avenues are extended, the rule which once prevailed has been reversed, and the extension of the railways is demanded by the people, instead of being asked for by the railway companies. There are those who are ready to concede their utility to the fullest extent, and yet who object to them on the ground that they still offer obstruction to other travel, in consequence of the faults of their construction, and the width of track, as well as the cumbersomeness of the carriages. The grooved rails are laid upon longitudinal wooden sills, which in their turn lay upon wooden cross-ties. This wooden structure is filled up with gravel in which the pavement is laid. The pavement and railway are therefore two independent structures, neither dependent upon the other. In some cases the rails settle below the paving, and in others the paving below the rails. The greater the difference of level between the two, the greater is the obstruction to ordinary travel. If both could be kept upon the same level this objection would cease.

Another difficulty is, that the perishable nature of the sills renders a renewal necessary every few years, and a constant repair is going on.

The width of gauge adopted upon existing street railways seems to be entirely an accidental feature, the other roads in New York adopting the same gauge as the Harlem road, which was constructed originally without reference to being used as a street railway. In other cities the same gauge has been adopted without any better reason.

There is certainly no good reason why a railway for street purposes, to be used with horse power and with small light cars, and at a speed not exceeding five or six miles to the hour, should require a width of gauge, such as is sufficient for bearing locomotives and trains at a speed of thirty or forty miles per hour.

The ordinary street cars in use are seven and a half feet in width, and might with advantage be reduced to six. Our large passenger cars drawn by locomotives are nine to nine and a half feet. The same proportion between the width of car and width of track would give from three to three and a third feet as sufficient for a street railway, without making allowance for the difference of speed.

The objection to the wide gauge and the wide car does not apply with the same force in Pennsylvania avenue as in some of the narrower streets in New York, Boston, Brooklyn, and Philadelphia, through which railways are laid. But there are other considerations in favor of the narrow car and narrow track, which apply equally everywhere. The width proposed for this avenue is three feet six inches to four feet for the track, and five and a half to six feet for the cars. Their height from the pavement will be about twenty-two inches. They are, in fact, similar to an omnibus body, elongated and resting upon car-wheels, but much lower. Their capacity is for twenty passengers, and they are designed to be drawn by one horse only.

These carriages are ornamental in form and design, and will not occupy more than thirteen feet of the width of the street, from out to out of carriages on a double track. No conductor is required, the driver performing the same duties as the omnibus driver. Passengers need not be annoyed by persons standing in their front, or by the constant passing of a conductor through a crowded passage way. In the use of one horse only, which is permitted by the lightness of the carriages, the travel is in the center, between the two tracks, where a perfect foothold is obtained.

A more prompt, speedy, and comfortable transit of passengers is insured, because of the small number that it is proposed to carry in each carriage. Their stops will be fewer than the large car; they can stop and start more readily. To do a given amount of traffic the carriages must be run at more frequent intervals; thus accommodating the public better. The transit will be more regular and rapid, and their convenience in every way enhanced to the public over any heretofore used. The whole movement in the street will not be dissimilar to that of only two lines of omnibuses, but far more safe and convenient because less elevated from the pavement, occupying less width, having no axles, wheels, and hubs projecting beyond the body of the carriage, and confined to straight lines in the center of the street, instead of being scattered over its entire width.

While admitting the plausibility of some of the arguments against railways in thronged thoroughfares, on account of a few defects in their construction and of the space the ordinary carriages occupy, and the consequent interruption to other vehicles, there can be no question but that the railway affords the most comfortable, and the most convenient and economical means of transport for passengers from one point of a city to another. Remedy the few defects in the tracks referred to, and divest the railway carriage of its cumbersomeness, and these objections cease. The same number of passengers may be carried by railway with half the number of carriages and one quarter the number of horses that would be required with omnibuses. The pavements are relieved from immense wear and tear. The noise and dust is avoided. The ingress and egress is easier and more convenient. They are safer to pedestrians, because the route of the car is fixed and well known. A brake is always under the hand of the driver, and the impetus of the car is overcome much more promptly than that of the omnibuses; and, finally, the rates of fare less than in omnibuses.

It cannot be believed that conveniences of public transport of such a nature, and so divested of all the remaining objectionable features which it is alleged pertain to them in cities where they are used, can be otherwise than beneficial to the interests of the city, and to the value of property along their route.

It is a significant fact that in the city of New York, where railways are used with all the faults in their construction which their opponents set forth against them, property in the longitudinal avenues through which they run has, since their construction, increased in value fifty per cent., while in similar and parallel avenues which have no railways, it has not increased ten per cent. In Brooklyn the railway system has developed and brought into use property to the extent of ten times the whole cost of the roads, which for years yet, without such facilities, would have been unimproved and valueless. The track proposed in this case is a very narrow one. It is contemplated that the tracks shall be but six feet in width, and the whole space required will probably not exceed fourteen feet of the center of the street, which is one hundred and fifty feet wide. The cars are to be one-horse cars of a very handsome model, and very ornamental. So far from disfiguring the avenue, I think they would rather improve its appearance.

It seems to me that an orderly and systematic movement of vehicles thus confined to the center of the street, by small grooves in the pavements, would not mar the beauty of the avenue to the same extent as clumsy and noisy omnibuses traveling in every direction over its entire width.

The subject of railways for passengers only, in many of the principal cities of the country, and more especially in the city of New York, has attracted great public interest. Much valuable evidence has been elicited in connection with the topic, and, as it will hereafter continue to draw public attention to it until every city in the Union will have railways through the principal thoroughfares, it may not be inappropriate to give, in this connection, a portion of some testimony bearing directly upon the utility of such railways in the city of New York, given by prominent citizens of that city with whom I am well acquainted, who were examined as witnesses under a commission issued in certain legal proceedings had between the city of Louisville and the Louisville and Portland Railway Company.

Edwin Smith, for twenty-five years city surveyor and civil engineer, states that—

"The avenues in the upper part of the city are about this width, namely: sixty feet between the curb stones, but with the exception of Canal street and a part of the Bowery, the streets in the lower part of the city are much narrower; Oliver street, through which a railway passes, is but twenty-one feet between the curbs. Some of them are main thoroughfares. Fulton street, in Brooklyn, is the principal street. The system of railways in that city all converges into this street, and all the cars from the various lines run through it to the ferry at its foot. The track in South street, New York, runs directly along the wharves of East river, where an immense shipping business is transacted, and where heavy draying is required. The cars upon the roads mentioned are propelled by horse power, and the roads are esteemed of great public utility. In Brooklyn, Fulton street remains the principal street, as it was before railways were laid in it. The railway gives importance to the street and value to the property, and tends to retain for it the character of the principal street of the city. In New York the property has been greatly enhanced in value upon the streets where railways have been constructed. The effect upon property may be judged by the effect in the avenues in the upper part of the city. The avenues in which railways have not been constructed, viz: A, B, C, and D, and Seventh avenue, are streets in which but little business is done; while Second, Third, Fourth, Sixth, Eighth, &c., have a large amount of business, and are business thoroughfares.

"In the lower part of the city, the most extensive and costly stores for wholesale and jobbing purposes are being constructed upon streets in which railways are laid, or in their immediate vicinity. That portion of the city upon and in the immediate vicinity of the lower terminus of the Sixth and Eighth avenue railroads, is now undergoing greater improvements in rebuilding, for heavy commercial purposes, than any other. As compared with omnibuses, the elements of convenience, not only to the passenger, but to the other travel of the streets, is decidedly in favor of the cars, even with their present width of seven to seven and a half feet. They occupy less space than omnibuses, as the latter have their wheels projecting from and outside of the body of the carriage, occupying eight and a half to nine feet, while the former have their wheels inside of the body. Cars for street purposes, if devised expedient, might be made narrower than those at present used; and if the bodies were made of the same width as omnibus bodies, namely, five feet three inches, they would occupy but twelve feet from outside to outside, on a double line, allowing for a space of one and one half feet between them. With the same space between any two omnibuses, they would occupy about seventeen and a half feet.

"Property is rated higher, and is more valuable as a general thing, upon streets upon which railways are laid, than upon similar and parallel streets through which railways have not been laid. For instance, in Sixth and Eighth avenues, since the railroads have been laid, the property along the lines and on the crossing streets has been more than doubled in value."

"Chatham street, which is about thirty three feet wide between the curb stones, is the great thoroughfare for the eastern half of the city; the travel from all the main streets on that section, namely: Bowery, East Broadway, Division street, and others, converging into it at Chatham square, in its course to Broadway. The cars of the First, Second, and Third avenue roads pass through Chatham street. The tracks were laid in 1854, and the project met with the most strenuous opposition, on the ground that the street was so narrow as to render it impossible for the cars to pass without interfering with and obstructing all other travel, thus ruining the business of the street, and depreciating the value of real estate. The result has proved the entire reverse of these anticipations, and the railways have been of great advantage to the street, increasing its business and enhancing the value of its property. It still remains the great tunnel for all the travel of the eastern side of the city, and it is freely admitted that the cars do not inconvenience the other travel so much as omnibuses. The result of the experiment, in this, conclusively demonstrates that railways may be laid and cars run in streets of thirty three feet width, without embarrassing the miscellaneous travel, or injuring the property or business of such streets; but, on the contrary, proving positively beneficial to both. One principal reason is the regulation given to the other travel, by the cars being confined to certain lines in the middle of the street. The miscellaneous travel naturally divides on either side as the cars pass, and no clashing or collision occurs, because the course of the cars is fixed and well known. The travel is facilitated by this natural regulation, and the liability to obstruction of the streets, by a 'jam' of vehicles, greatly lessened. It is upon this demonstration, fully examined, inquired into, and admitted, that the authorities of Brooklyn relied in adopting the system of railways now in operation in that city.

"I was a member of the Board of Aldermen of the city of New York in the years 1850 and 1851, when the discussion upon these various railroad projects came up, and thus have had my attention drawn particularly to the subject of the requirements of a large city in the means of the transportation of passengers through the streets. I was also a member of several committees of the Common Council having this subject under consideration, and heard nearly all the arguments and testimony presented for and against these roads, previous to their adoption. They were opposed before the committee, in the most strenuous manner, by some of the most influential citizens of the city, and by influential property owners in the street through which they were destined to pass. Since the construction of the roads the most bitter of these opponents have admitted their utility, and that their property has been enhanced in value by the roads, instead of being depreciated; and my whole investigation of the subject at that time, as well as my observation and knowledge of the result, has satisfied me that the street railway and car present advantages far beyond any existing method for the transportation of passengers through the streets, and that their tendency is rather to equalize the value of property, not by depreciating that at the center of business, but by enhancing that more remote."

Edmund Griffin says:

"I was a member of the Board of Aldermen of the city of New York in the years 1850 and 1851. It was at this time that the project of the various city railroads, since constructed, was broached, and the discussions, pro and con, before the city government, drew my attention to that subject. I have been familiar with these projects through their construction and operation, and am satisfied that in no other way could the requirements of a large city, in the means of the transportation of passengers, be fulfilled with so little inconvenience to other travel, or with so little hazard of injury to private interests. The operation of the railway on Chatham street has been considered a test, in regard to the question of inconvenience to other travel and damage to business and property, as that street is a great thoroughfare for the eastern portion of the city, and is but thirty three feet wide between the curbs. The operation of that road has been a conclusive demonstration that street railways are not only of great public utility, but that they do not inconvenience and obstruct the other travel and business of the street to any extent comparable with omnibuses, and that their influence upon the value of property along their line is beneficial. The operation of the New York street railways was thoroughly examined by the authorities of Brooklyn city before the adoption of the system which has been constructed in the latter city. When the system was first proposed, the entire city government, with but two or three exceptions, were totally opposed to its construction; but, after a year's examination of the New York city roads, the government of Brooklyn adopted an entire system, radiating in various directions through the city."

James S. Libby, also, says:

"I was one of the original projectors and constructors of the Sixth avenue railroad, and president of the company. The project met with great opposition, as it was the first street railway designed exclusively for city uses. The Harlem Railroad Company had used small cars between the park and 27th street, but their road was constructed with the ordinary T rail, and was inconvenient to ordinary vehicles in crossing. The project was opposed on the ground of this inconvenience. It was argued that it would interfere with and incommode the ordinary travel, and thus prove detrimental to the business of the streets through which it passed, and consequently depreciate the value of the property. The adoption of grooved rail removed the one serious difficulty. The railway has proved a great public convenience—has enhanced the value of property along its entire line, and the arguments of the opposition have been shown to be entirely groundless.

"The operation of the railroad in Chatham street has been the most perfect refutation of all the arguments of the opposers of street railways, as that street is the thoroughfare for a large portion of the city, and is but thirty-three feet wide. I consider it to be perfectly demonstrated by the operation of the street railways of New York as well as Brooklyn, that, properly constructed, they are a great public convenience, and that they enhance the property in their vicinity and along their line, and that the cars inconvenience ordinary travel less than omnibuses.

"I own valuable real estate facing directly on the line of the Third and Fourth avenue roads, near their terminus, opposite the Astor House, and consider its value greatly enhanced by the roads, notwithstanding the street, Park row, being the connection between Chatham street and Broadway, is the thoroughfare for all the travel of the eastern portion of the city."

This concurring testimony of persons thoroughly familiar with this subject fully sustains the position assumed, and seems calculated to dispel the doubts of those most opposed to such projects. The impression that first strikes the mind of those not familiar with the question, is, that the same inconvenience would result as from large and unwieldy cars used with locomotives, which would undoubtedly injure the fine appearance and effect of the avenue. The objection, in such case, does not hold good in the present one. This is the age of progression; as the old-fashioned stage coaches have given way to splendid steamers and railroads, so must the omnibuses yield to the improvement in daily and hourly travel by light and tasteful cars upon passenger railways. However much we may be wedded to old customs and associations, the people are restive under them when new and important improvements are originated and carried to a successful result. The country is constantly advancing in its great career, not only by the energy of its people, but also by its constant progress in the mechanic and useful arts, in which I believe we excel any other nation. While science, the arts, literature, and commerce have been gradually advancing and performing their share in the movements of the age, the mechanical genius of our countrymen has developed successive improvements in the mode and manner of traveling, and thus facilitated the extraordinary growth of the country, invited social intercourse, and drawn the people of distant portions of the Union in close proximity,

This project seems to me to be one of importance, involving the convenience and interests of the citizens of this metropolis, and those who may visit it for pleasure or upon business. Street railways have become indispensable means of communication between distant portions of cities, and the center of business, and their suburbs. I think that if the bill is fairly discussed, and that careful consideration is given to the subject which it merits, the prejudices of many gentlemen of the House will be removed, and we may pass this bill, authorizing the construction of the railroad. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. KELSEY. I hope that motion will prevail. This is the only bill I have seen here today that does not ask us to do something for the people of the District that they ought to do for themselves.

Mr. LETCHER. I propose to amend the first section of the bill by inserting the words, "subject to such other regulations as to fares, as Congress may from time to time prescribe." As it now stands, the amount of fares is fixed absolutely at five cents, and it may happen that in the course of the next five or ten years that amount may be very exorbitant. I shall propose also, at the proper time, to amend the sixth section, by adding the words, "and to the Congress of the United States is hereby reserved the right to alter, amend, or annul this act at pleasure."

Mr. WARD. I believe there is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. BURNETT. The Committee for the District of Columbia agreed that this bill might be reported to the House by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD.] I am opposed to the bill, and was opposed to it as a member of the committee. I think it would be bad legislation for us to authorize the construction of a railroad along Pennsylvania avenue under any circumstances. The gentleman has called the attention of the committee to the railroads in the city of New York. I grant you that, if Washington was a city like New York, with a population of seven hundred and fifty thousand, as New York proper has, with commerce, trade, and manufactures, and everything that goes to make up a great commercial city, then there might be some reason in the passage of a bill authorizing the construction of a railroad here. But you have a population of only fifty thousand here. You propose to lay a track along Pennsylvania avenue, and to give the corporators the privilege of running cars over that track every three minutes. Now, Pennsylvania avenue is the most beautiful street in the city; it is the great thoroughfare of the city; it is the Broadway of the city. This railroad would not only obstruct the passage of hacks and omnibuses, but it would interfere with and delay travel of every sort across the avenue at the various crossings. Moreover, it would destroy the beauty of the street entirely. And for what? For nothing at all. You surrender this franchise to this corporation, to this monopoly, without deriving a dollar of benefit from it.

Let me state another fact to the committee. There is a proposition now pending before the District Committee, and which was referred to the gentleman from New York at our last meeting, from the Metropolitan Railroad Company, who propose to build this track, and to extend it in connection with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, taking the charter of incorporation on the same terms as this company, for the same length of time, and with the right to charge the very same fare; but they agree to carry the Government stores, munitions of war, and everything of that sort, and the United States mails, free of charge. Now, if you intend to grant this privilege to any corporation, why not take the one that makes that offer? Shall we grant a monopoly to this company without any corresponding benefit at all?

Mr. KELSEY. Is there any corporation created by this bill?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not think there is. That is my opinion as a lawyer.

Mr. KELSEY. It is a mere privilege granted to individuals, or rather to a partnership. Nor is there any monopoly in it, because a similar privilege could be granted at any time to any other persons to construct a railroad on Pennsylvania avenue, or any other street in the city.

Mr. BURNETT. It is hardly to be supposed that any other company would build a road with this one already in operation along the avenue, and certainly we should never grant them the privilege. But if we adopt any plan for building the road, I think we ought to take that proposition which is best for the Government.

Mr. ADRAIN. I desire to know if the citizens of Washington desire this railroad through Pennsylvania avenue?

Mr. BURNETT. I take it for granted that the citizens of Washington do not.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Two years ago the officials of this city and Georgetown recommended it, and I have not heard of any later action.

Mr. ADRAIN. I wanted to know if any action had been taken by the citizens in favor of building the road.

Mr. BURNETT. I have a proposition to make to the friends of the bill that will give us a test vote upon it, and that is that it be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. LETCHER. If the gentleman will indulge me for a moment, let us, by general consent, get in some amendments, so that if the bill goes to the House we may be protected.

Now, here is a monstrous provision in the fourth section. It is that these parties shall keep the road in repair only between the rails, a width of four feet. The road will be constantly getting out of order for at least two feet on the other side of the rails, and they ought to be required to repair all the pavement to which injury is done. There is another thing in this fourth section that is monstrous. It provides that if the corporation of the city chooses to take this property off the hands of these parties, they shall pay the parties for the unexpired part of this grant from us. Now, let us see how that is going to work? Suppose it has ten years to run, and that it pays fifty or one hundred thousand dollars a year, will not the value of the franchise which you propose to pay for be ten times fifty or one hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I rise to a question of order. There are some other gentlemen who desire to be heard on this important measure, and I want to know if it is in order for the time to all be taken up by gentlemen from Virginia and Kentucky?

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman from Georgia certainly cannot complain, for I yielded the floor to him.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman from Kentucky, as I understand it, intends to move to strike out the enacting clause, and I wanted to suggest these amendments. If they can be reported to the House by general consent, I will not take up the time of the committee by any remarks.

Mr. BURNETT. I have said all that I desire to say in reference to this measure. I think it would destroy the beauty of the city by building a railroad along Pennsylvania avenue; and I do not think there is any necessity for such a railroad in a city of fifty thousand inhabitants. It may be useful to establish railways in a crowded city, but I do not think it is necessary between this city and Georgetown; nor is there any evidence that the people desire it.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the amendments which I have offered, will be allowed to come in by unanimous consent.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I desire to say a single word. This is a matter about which I have heard a good deal among the citizens of the place. I have no possible interest in it, except as a citizen of the Republic, to establish a work which shall be useful to the capital of the country and the interests which I feel in it for my own convenience. But I must be permitted to say, that since the application has been made here to run a railway along Pennsylvania avenue, there has been some parties at work—I do not charge members of Congress as having been concerned in it in any way—for a purpose not intended to be, nor likely to be, serviceable to the country, in opposing this grant. I could mention individuals who have already been permitted to come in as parties for the simple reason that it was found necessary in order to prevent them from using their influence to defeat the bill. Now, I desire that the House shall act upon this bill upon its merits, and that the schemes of interlopers and outsiders shall not be permitted to prejudice a great work like this, which is for the benefit of the Republic, here in the capital of the country. Let this grant stand upon its merits. It is the first company which has made application, and I think the grant should be given to them. The capital of the country would be improved by it, if you will give them the opportunity, and it costs the Government nothing.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I will state that one of the parties in this bill is the omnibus proprietor. I understand that he has invested something like one hundred thousand dollars in stocking his line of omnibuses, and it would be doing injustice to him to make any arrangement in which he should not be included. He is entitled to priority.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I thank the gentleman for the interruption. This is an important question. It is one of the improvements of the nineteenth century, that we should not be confined to the old system of hacks and omnibuses; and yet the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURNETT] is opposed to it, because he considers the old system of hacks preferable to the new system of traveling along the streets by railway.

Mr. BURNETT. I will just say this: that I am in favor of improvements in everything where improvements are needed; but in a city like this, without commerce, trade, or population, I will not vote for the establishment of such a railway.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. My friend from Kentucky is a very positive sort of man. He is positive in his concurrence in a measure, or he is strong in his opposition to it. I like him all the better for it; but unless a bill is his peculiar bantling, he is sure to pounce upon it. I am sorry that this bill did not come from the committee-room as the bantling of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BURNETT. My friend from Georgia will remember that I was in the committee-room when this proposition first came there, and that I opposed it from its inception; and my recollection is, that if the vote had been taken in committee at that time, when I was present, we should have voted it down.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I did not so understand it; we certainly did vote it up. I thought my friend was absent when this bill was under consideration by the committee. I should have been happy if it could have had his support.

Mr. COVODE. As long as this discussion goes on, and gentlemen keep offering amendments, we shall never get through.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I was simply making an explanation.

Mr. COVODE. The gentleman is talking about questions of progress and improvement; but if the gentleman will allow me, I will suggest that these railways have recently been introduced into the streets of Philadelphia. There was great opposition to the introduction of the first one, but they have since been introduced into four or five streets, and they give universal satisfaction to people of all classes in that city. An application was made to the last Legislature for permission to build other roads, and they are now being built in all directions through the different streets of the city; and, instead of being an injury, they are a very great improvement to the streets through which they run.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I am extremely obliged to the gentleman for the interruption. It is a question of progress, whether we shall have the omnibus running up and down the avenue, from daybreak until sunset, making a noise like the thunders of Sinai, or whether we shall have in its place a railway, with comfortable and handsome cars, running smoothly along, drawn by horse power, tandem, and shaded by the trees lining the route. Was a man ever in a place where a railroad was in operation that did not go away satisfied that it was an improvement, and one of the greatest improvements of the age? I apprehend that the gentleman from Kentucky has not been in New York lately.

Mr. HILL. I wish to suggest, in all charity to my colleague, that all members do not come from Georgia, which State has done so much in the way of building railroads, and that therefore they are not so familiar with the great advantages to result from such improvements.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Then I can only regret it. I am speaking seriously in reference to this matter; and I say that no man can be where railroads are in operation without being satisfied that they are one of the greatest improvements of the age. One of their beneficial effects is to cheapen travel. By the introduction of this railway into Washington, the fare is at once reduced from six and a quarter cents, now charged by the omnibus, to five cents. [Laughter.] Gentlemen may laugh if they will, but this nevertheless stands as I have stated it, and it is a large reduction on the charge.

Mr. STANTON. The railroad is to set you down at the boundary of the city, while the omnibus takes you into Georgetown.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. If the gentleman will reflect on the matter, he will see that there is no necessity for these cars, propelled by horse-power, to stop at all.

Mr. STANTON. What I state is, that the cars must stop at the corporation limits—that the corporation line is the terminus of the road.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to detain the committee as long as I have. I am in favor of this railroad on principle. I believe it to be, I will repeat, an improvement in every respect. You can get into the railway car easier than you can into an omnibus. There is hardly any stopping necessary. The cars pass along smoothly, and any party that has quickness of motion can easily get into them. Anybody under seventy-five years of age can get into them without their stopping. There is, too, a reduction of one and a quarter cent on the fare. This may be a small item to members of Congress, who sit upon their cushioned chairs, and draw $3,000 per annum, besides mileage, which, for California members, amounts to something handsome; and even for members from my own State runs up to something like four or five hundred dollars. But, sir, take the bone and sinew of this land, the men and women who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, as God intended we should all do, and it is a right sharp item. It is a consideration to them how much they will pay for travel, when they have to travel many times a week, or it may be, several times a day.

There is another beneficial result. It equalizes the population. I do not want to compel a rich man to come down and ride in these cars, but I want to fix the matter so that he can do it. These railway cars, we see from experience, carry all sorts of people, fashionable men and fashionable women, the wealthy contractor and the poor laborer.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Do you not think that the poor people of your district are as much entitled to a railroad as the poor people here?

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I do.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Why, then, do you not offer to appropriate for them as well as for the people here?

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I have appropriated a great deal already for them. But these gentlemen do not ask for any appropriation; they propose to build this road and to keep it in repair. The question is with you, then, whether you will ride in an omnibus for six and a quarter cents or in a railway car for five cents, without any cost to the Government at all.

Mr. COVODE. I will trouble my friend with another suggestion. If this road be built, the road is kept up at the expense of the parties who build it; but if the travel is to go on as it has done heretofore, the streets will wear with the rolling of those omnibuses over them, and will have to be repaired at the expense of the Government; so that, by the introduction of these cars, there will be an immense reduction of expense to the Government.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. It had occurred to me, but would have escaped me if the gentleman had not recalled it to my mind. I am about through what I proposed to say. This road will cost the Government nothing. The simple question for the House to determine is whether it will allow it to be built?

The gentleman from Kentucky says it will spoil Pennsylvania avenue. Now, is not a car drawn by a couple of horses in a straight line along Pennsylvania avenue, a more comely sight than these ungainly omnibuses rolling along, dodging from one side of the avenue to the other?

Mr. LETCHER. I would like to know if it ever occurred to the committee in their deliberations on this subject, to examine whether it would be impracticable to provide that members of Congress shall travel free over the road?

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. This road, I presume, is to run in the day time; and I cannot say whether it will run when members travel most—at night time. [Laughter.]

Mr. COVODE. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, always leaving it in the hands of Congress to change, alter, or amend, would certainly give members of Congress claims upon the company to travel free.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I will close my remarks by moving that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. LEITER. I move to strike out the enactment clause.

Mr. DODD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion, and allow the vote to be taken on the amendments.

Mr. LEITER. I am willing to withdraw the motion on consideration that gentlemen will come to a vote.

Mr. COX. I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It is certain that we cannot get on with this bill to-night.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. LETCHER. I understand that there is no objection to the amendment which I have proposed.

The question was taken on Mr. LETCHER's amendment; and it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, to strike out the names mentioned in the bill, and in their place to substitute the words "the corporation of the city of Washington."

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move that the committee rise. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] Then I will advocate my amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. If it is in order, I move that the committee take a recess for an hour and a-half. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I call for tellers on that motion.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will proceed then to advocate my amendment.

The lines which I propose to amend confers a large fortune upon three persons. I say that my knowledge of the business, and of such operations as this, convinces me that such a donation as this by the Congress of the United States to three persons—I do not know who they are; I do not even know the proprietor of the omnibus line—gives to them a large fortune. Sir, I ask this House if this is the sort of legislation which should characterize our action? I ask this House if they, sitting here to legislate for the fifty thousand inhabitants of this District, will pick out three of them and bestow upon them a splendid fortune? Some gentleman says they are not citizens of the District. If that is so, so much the worse for them; you take a fortune out of the people of the District and give it to those who are not citizens.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to ask the gentleman if the amendment which has just been admitted, authorizing Congress to control the rate of fare, does not preclude the possibility of any injustice being done to the inhabitants of Washington?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. No, sir.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa. The provision of the amendment authorizes a resumption of the franchise at any time by the city of Washington.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I understand it all. I propose by my amendment to give this franchise to the city of Washington. But, says the gentleman, the city of Washington has the right to acquire it if she pleases. Now let us look at it. The bill provides that the privileges hereby granted shall continue for the term of twenty-five years; but at any time during said period the Government, or the authorities of the city of Washington, shall have the right to take possession of said railway, with the real and personal property belonging thereto, and necessary to the operation thereof, upon payment to said parties, and assigns the appraised value thereof, and of the unexpired franchise, said appraisements to be made by one person to be selected by the President of the United States, another by the parties aforesaid, and, in the event of their disagreement, by a third person, to be selected by the persons so named. That is all they have a right to. They have no right to exact anything from the city of Washington, but the value of their investment. But that is not all. How long is this franchise to continue? A day, a month, or for all time? No, sir; but just exactly so long as it may be the pleasure of Congress.

Mr. QUITMAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me to say that, during this whole period, Congress has the absolute right of annulling or making such alterations of this charter as it pleases?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. My friend from Mississippi knows very well how very difficult it is to effect any change where private rights are concerned. My experience has taught me, and his experience must have taught him, that this is the fact.

Mr. QUITMAN. If there is the amount of money involved in this matter which the gentleman supposes, the public would be opposed to the monopoly, and perhaps would improperly interfere with the privileges of the company.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It is Congress that must act, and not the public; and, when we cannot turn out a page except under some excitement, or change our Doorkeeper without the greatest commotion, the gentleman may form some idea of the difficulty there would be in taking action against a railroad. It would appeal to us in a thousand ways, touching our hearts.

If this is a road which ought to be established—and I concede that it ought to be—I am in favor of it; but I want to know what reason there is for giving the privilege to these three persons alone? Gentlemen may say that there is nobody else who will undertake this work; but I tell you there are plenty of persons who would jump at such an enterprise.

Mr. QUITMAN. Permit me to say that this bill does not prevent Congress, at any time, if the enterprise be profitable, from authorizing other contractors to lay a track right by the side of this track.

Mr. STANTON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. I want to know of him if he contemplates, by his amendment, that the corporation of Washington shall, by taxation upon the citizens, raise a fund, and build the railroad, and then appoint persons to manage it, and make itself the operator of a line of omnibuses between here and Georgetown? Is that the idea?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Certainly, sir.

Mr. STANTON. Well, it is a novel one to me.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Wonderfully novel, indeed; wonderfully novel, certainly. [Laughter.] I hold that there would be no difficulty about it in the world.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I would like to know what the pending amendment is?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Does the gentleman want to put a question to me?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then I would like to know how the gentleman got the floor?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I made, if it please the Chair, a very serious effort, and reached the floor with difficulty. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the pending amendment is the one offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] to strike out the names of the parties in the bill and insert the corporation of Washington.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Do I understand the gentleman from Virginia to offer an amendment to confer this right upon the corporation of Washington?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Will he permit me to ask him whether he has any knowledge that the corporation would be willing to build the railroad? And will he state to the committee what is the present indebtedness of the corporation, and what its capacity would be to put a line of railroad in operation?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. If three of the citizens of Washington can build it, I think that all the citizens together can do it without doubt. What does the gentleman think of that? [Laughter.] I think that a corporation, whose stock is above par, can raise money enough to lay down a railroad track for a mile and a half, and stock the road, too. But the House will observe that I propose to give this franchise to the corporation of the city of Washington, and to give them power to deal with the question, instead of our doing it. If there be money to be made by it, let all have a finger in it. If there be a large profit to be realized from it, let it be diffused. Let it go into the common treasury, and diminish the taxation, and perhaps diminish the demands of the city upon us.

But, I again ask, and I should like the gentleman from Georgia, or the innocent gentleman from Ohio, to answer the question, why it is that we should grant this franchise to these three persons?

Mr. STANTON. Will the gentleman guarantee that if his amendment prevails, the city of Washington will not quarter the expense of the concern on the national Treasury?

Mr. FLORENCE. Or ask Congress to make appropriations to relieve them?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. That is a very pertinent inquiry; and I would ask the gentleman whether if the city of Washington made money out of the transaction—as these three persons to whom the franchise is to be accorded expect to do—they would seek to quarter the expense on the national Treasury?

Mr. STANTON. I will tell the gentleman that I never knew a municipal corporation that was capable of managing an enterprise of this sort. It is a matter of profit or loss to individuals, and it requires a private corporation or individual enterprise to attend to such things. State or national corporations usually lose money in enterprises that would be profitable to individuals. That is the experience of the whole country, and everybody knows it.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I rise to a question of order; and it is, that these interruptions are not in order. The gentleman from Virginia should be allowed to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia yielded the floor to the gentleman from Ohio to answer a question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have asked repeatedly, in different directions of this House, why it is that we should grant what is unmistakably a valuable franchise to these three gentlemen. I have not been answered. I have heard no reason given why these three gentlemen should enjoy this privilege exclusively. I would like to know.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to answer the gentleman. I never heard of this bill until within the last hour. I do not know anything about it privately, nor do I care. But this bill proposes that these men shall build this road within a specified time, and in a particular manner, and it gives this very corporation of Washington the privilege of taking the property at any time for what it is worth. Now, if the corporation can build the road in six months, let them do it; but these men propose to do it within that time; and it makes no difference who does it, provided the road is built.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. With the permission of the gentleman from Virginia, I will answer his question. One of the gentlemen named in the bill is the proprietor of the line of omnibuses now in operation between the Capitol and Georgetown, and the Capitol and the Navy-Yard, and inasmuch as the construction of the railroad would destroy large vested interests of his, the committee considered it right and fair to allow him this privilege.

I will state further, that at the time this bill was approved by the Committee for the District of Columbia, no other proposition was before that committee; and I believe that up to the time the bill was reported to the House, no other parties had applied for permission to build the road.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I believe that it is an undeniable fact, that Mr. Vanderwerken, the owner of the omnibus line between the Capitol and Georgetown, was opposed, in the first instance, to the construction of the railroad, but he has since been brought in and made a party to this rich endowment. The idea that he has vested rights—I must be pardoned for saying—is rather an amusing one. Vested rights in a line of omnibuses running on a public highway!

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is taking advantage of my imperfect phraseology. I meant to say that he had a large amount of money invested.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. "Vested" is one thing, and "invested" is another; and there is a material difference between them in common parlance. Now, the interest that this gentleman possesses is the interest that his capital has given him, and his successful rivalry, for he has run down all opposition heretofore; and so they gracefully submitted to his coming into the scheme. But let all that pass.

I have not yet seen or heard any sufficient reason why we should give this franchise to these gentlemen. Let this bill be so amended as to let the persons who will take it on the best terms for the city get it. Put it up, if you choose, at auction. Devise some means for disposing of this franchise. As it is, it is a violation of every fair principle of legislation, in my judgment.

Mr. AVERY. I desire to offer the following amendment as a proviso to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That an election shall be held of the qualified voters of the city of Washington under the laws regulating elections in said city, on the first Monday of August, 1858, at which the question of "railroad" or "no railroad" shall be submitted to them, and if a majority of the said voters vote against said railroad, then this grant shall be, and is hereby, declared null and void.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment is not in order at present, until the other amendments are disposed of.

Mr. AVERY. I just wish to say that until this bill was reported I had never heard of this proposition to run a railroad through Pennsylvania avenue.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Tennessee that the pending question is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. GROW. I do not propose to trespass on the patience of the committee. I know that gentlemen are already very anxious to dispose of this business, and adjourn. Therefore I have but a word to say; and that is in reply to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] in his notions of legislation. If there be a franchise to be granted, may it not just as well be granted to individuals as to a corporation? A legislative body, I take it, is bound in all cases to act on this principle, and this alone: is their act for the public benefit? If so, they should pass it; if not, they should not. If it be an act of a general character, beneficial in its results, what consequence is it what amount of money citizens may make out of it?

No railroad would be built anywhere on the principle laid down by the gentleman from Virginia, for the reason that no men would invest their money to build a railroad, unless they thought they would make money out of it; and if they were to, on the principle advocated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] they ought not to have a charter. It is for the Legislature to determine whether a railroad is to be for the advantage of the public. If it is, then it is no matter what amount of money may be made out of it by the persons who engage in it. In this case the question is, whether a railroad through Pennsylvania avenue will be of benefit to the city. If it would be, are we to stop and ask how much money the men who build the railroad are to make out of it, especially when the conditions proposed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] are thrown around the bill, enabling Congress to alter, change, or abolish the charter at pleasure. But why not grant this franchise to a citizen, as well as to a municipal corporation? If a public injury, it should be granted to neither; if a general benefit, what objection to granting to one any more than the other?

I am not sure in my own mind whether the bill ought to pass. I only rose to protest against the doctrine that a legislative body ought, in any case, to be governed in its action by the consideration of whether a citizen is to make money out of the franchises it grants, instead of considering whether those franchises are for the public good or not. I would as soon give the charter to three citizens as to a corporation. The objection lies as much against giving it to the corporation as to any private citizen of the Republic.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] asks for some reason why this charter should be granted in this manner. I did not care to interrupt him at the time, but I will tell him now. I understood him to profess to be friendly to the measure.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I want the railroad.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The gentleman is in favor of the railroad along the avenue, which is one hundred and sixty feet wide. The width of the track is to be only twelve or fourteen feet. Now, I will tell him why the charter should be given to individuals, not to the corporation. It is to secure its being built at all. If authority to build it were given to the corporation of the city of Washington, it by no means follows that it would be built at all; but when authority is given to individuals to build it, it will be built. We know they will build it, for they have offered to do so. This bill gives the right to the city of Washington, whenever she may choose to reimburse to these individuals the money they may have expended, to strike out the present franchise. There can be but one opinion as to the fact that the way to have a railroad well built, with the apparatus in running order, in the best manner and in the cheapest style, is to give the charter to individuals, because individuals can certainly do public work at a cheaper price than corporations can. That I understand to be one reason why the bill was put in this shape.

Mr. GOODE. I desire to make a brief statement of the facts of the case. At an early day of the session, Mr. Chairman, application was made by these persons on the part of a company in New York, for permission to construct this road, in connection with a pavement from the Capitol to Georgetown, along Pennsylvania avenue, at a cost of from three quarters of a million to a million dollars. Pending the investigation before the committee, another company made application to construct a railroad on the present pavement. I had supposed that the present applicants were the agents of the New York company, whose name and style were not developed before the committee.

Well, sir, it soon came to pass that the parties to the second application disappeared from the city, and these gentlemen, who are now applying, are the sole applicants. At first, Mr. Vanderwerken was decidedly and violently opposed to the whole scheme. The second application was withdrawn. I know not what became of it since. These parties then came forward with Mr. Vanderwerken as the frontispiece of their proceedings, and asked for this charter to be given to them.

There can be no question, sir, that any capitalists will be willing to take this franchise whom the House may invest with it. I cannot sit by and hear it stated that this work cannot be done unless it be given to these men. There are others besides them who would be willing to do it. A New York company was the first petitioner for it.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has very much misunderstood me if he supposed that I objected to these particular individuals. I did not. I would prefer that it should be given to individuals rather than to corporations of any description. I do not know who these individuals are. I do not know one of them; but I would prefer giving it to them, whoever they are, than to the city of Washington.

The city of Washington has the power, under this bill, at any time, to take the property by paying its fair value; and if it is to come into the hands of the city corporation, they would get it more economically in this way, because it would be better built and cheaper built by individuals than it would be by the corporation. I am in favor of the bill. One of these railroads passes my own office in Philadelphia, and I find it no inconvenience. I think a railroad through Pennsylvania avenue would be decidedly a convenience; and I am in favor of having the road built.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, but I do not want to take up the time of the committee. I rise merely for the purpose of making a single remark in this connection. The gentleman from Virginia asked who these men were. Before answering the question of the gentleman, I will state that there are a number of these railways which have been built in Philadelphia, and that the law authorizing the construction of passenger railways in that city has provided in every instance that the omnibuses upon the routes should be purchased of the proprietors, with the horses and other property, by the corporation. I know of no instance where authority has been given by the Legislature of any State, authorizing the construction of passenger railways, where their restrictions have not been made. As I said at the commencement of this debate, I am in favor of establishing this thing on the principles of economy and usefulness.

Mr. LEITER. I rise to a question of order. When I made a motion to strike out the enacting clause, I thought it was the understanding to vote upon these amendments without any further debate. It was upon that understanding that I withdrew the motion. I submit whether, after that understanding, this debate is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio withdrew his motion unconditionally, as the Chair understood it, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, sir, I do not wish to detain the committee; and as gentlemen all around seem disposed to debate this matter, I move that the committee rise for the purpose of going into the House and terminating debate.

Mr. STANTON. If it be the general understanding of the committee that the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] may be offered in the House, we can get rid of the debate by striking out the enacting clause easier than in any other way.

Mr. FLORENCE. There are other amendments which gentlemen desire to offer. I will, however, withdraw my motion that the committee rise.

The amendment offered by Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, was not agreed to.

Mr. COX. I move to amend the section under consideration by requiring that the fare shall not exceed three cents instead of five cents. I do not wish to detain the committee this evening; but I have a few words to say in favor of that amendment before the question is taken on laying aside the bill. The gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WRIGHT,] to whom I am indebted for the suggestion of this amendment—though he, perhaps, did not intend it—spoke of bringing down these various conveniences to a price which poor people could afford to pay, so that all might enjoy these advantages alike. The gentleman comes fresh from the city of New York, where, he told me, he had never been before, and coming here full of illustrations of northern enterprise—I will not say pregnant [laughter] with illustrations of northern enterprises—and comes into this House, and gives, as a reason why this thing ought to be adopted, that we ought to let the poor people have a chance of riding in quick conveyances; that the omnibuses in which we have been traveling for the last twenty years do not go fast enough. Now, if this bill is to be adopted, I propose to carry out the gentleman's idea, and to bring it down to a point which shall do justice to poor people.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. As the gentleman seems to be serious in his amendment, I would suggest that, if the company find they can afford it, they will no doubt reduce the fare to three cents; but, as it may be found that three cents will not pay their expenses, I do not think they ought to be restricted to that rate of fare.

Mr. COX. It is said that a large fortune is in this thing. Here are three corporators—if it is a corporation—Gilbert Vanderwerken, Bayard Clarke, and Asa P. Robinson. We know nothing about them. I have some confidence, however, in the Committee for the District of Columbia. They, perhaps, know who these gentlemen are. They ought to give us full information. Who is Vanderwerken? It is said that he is the owner of the omnibus line, and has a large amount of money invested in it; that he is a man of large fortune already, and the gentleman from Georgia wishes to increase his fortune—to bring him down to a level with the poorer class.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I have not said that he was a man of fortune. He is the omnibus proprietor, with $100,000 invested in that business. I do not know whether it is remunerative or not.

Mr. COX. It is a proper and pertinent question who these parties are. Who is this Bayard Clarke? We do not know anything about him or his associates. In a matter where special privileges are asked for individuals, it is well to know who are the persons to whom such privileges are intrusted. We ought to know who they are before we give them a private fortune; and in order to prevent this fortune being made in this way, I propose to cut down the rate from five to three cents.

Mr. SHAW, of Illinois. I am struck with surprise, Mr. Chairman, in finding opposition to this bill. We have been called on by various bills to appropriate a large amount of money for this city, and, after opposition, they have been passed; but I do not understand the opposition to this bill, which does not ask for the appropriation of a dollar.

I regard this as a work of great improvement, and as consulting, in a national point of view, the interests of the country. This city is far behind the times in having no good means of communication between the Departments, and from one extreme of the city to another. I am astonished, I say, to see that there is opposition to it, when it does not call upon the Treasury for a dollar; but when we remember that large amounts of money have been already appropriated from an almost empty Treasury, and still larger ones asked for, we can appreciate the force of the opposition. We are now not asked for a dollar. We are only asked for the privilege to be given to the parties named to construct this road, which will inure to the benefit of the entire community.

But the gentleman from Virginia objects to the bill for the reason that it confers a franchise upon some two or three persons, with whom the gentleman is, unhappily, not acquainted. If he were, the inference is that that objection would be removed; but as he has not had their acquaintance, he shrewdly suspects that they may be money-making men, and will derive some advantage by constructing this work, which will be of great public utility. It is a matter of no consequence to me whether these men live in this city or out of it. We want the work constructed, and they ask us for the privilege of constructing it. In Philadelphia, in New York, and indeed in all the large cities, we find these railroads traversing the streets, and they are looked upon as a great public convenience.

The amount of fare may be regulated hereafter by Congress. I believe that five cents is an amount little enough. It is the price that is charged in New York and in Philadelphia for a like service. I hope the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. STANTON. I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON moved that the committee rise. The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order on business pertaining to the District of Columbia; and had directed him to report to the House sundry bills, some with and some without amendments.

Mr. GOODE. I design calling the previous question on all the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but before doing so, I wish to let the amendment suggested by my colleague [Mr. LETCHER] to the railroad bill come in. My impression is that those amendments were agreed to by the Committee for the District of Columbia, but were omitted from the bill by some inadvertence.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendments.

The Clerk read the amendments offered by Mr. LETCHER in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but which were cut off by striking out the enacting clause.

Mr. AVERY. I ask the consent of the gentleman from Virginia to allow me to offer the amendment which I offered in committee.

Mr. GOODE. I cannot yield for that purpose. The previous question was then seconded upon the several bills, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. STANTON. I suppose the House is not inclined to take the question upon these bills this evening; and as there are several gentlemen who desire to make speeches on subjects not connected with this bill, I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the understanding that no business is to be transacted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved (at ten minutes to seven o'clock) that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. HUGHES. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to say to the House, that, unless they intend that gentlemen shall make hour speeches upon the appropriation bills, they should allow the motion to prevail. Let gentlemen make speeches to-night upon general subjects, and you save that much time hereafter.

The motion was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BILLINGHURST in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 198) making appropriations for the preservation and repair of fortifications and other works of defense, barracks, and quarters, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

The committee was addressed by Mr. KELLY, Mr. CRAGIN, Mr. KEITT, Mr. GILMAN, Mr. BLISS, Mr. GILMER, Mr. MAYNARD, and Mr. FOSTER. [These speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and especially a bill making appropriations for the preservation and repair of fortifications and other works of defense, barracks, and quarters, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. MAYNARD, (at ten o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

We did not receive the following letter from Mr. REAGAN until the 25th instant, after the Congressional Globe had been stereotyped, printed, and sent to the extremes of the Union. We had caused the Daily Globe containing his remarks to be laid on his desk in the House of Representatives, the morning after he made them, for the purpose of correcting any errors he might discover, in order to make the Congressional Globe perfect; but it seems that he either overlooked the errors or neglected to correct them. All that we can do now to mend the matter is, to publish his letter, and index it where his remarks are pointed to in the index, and thus enable the reader to find the correction:

WASHINGTON, May 22, 1858.
DEAR SIR: In my remarks on the bill to quiet land titles in New Mexico, found on page 2097 of the Congressional Globe, I am made to say, "We should remember that the people of that Territory have occupied it for ages past, and that their titles are as old as their origin, and have passed out of mind." I made use of no such nonsense. I said their titles were as old as the settlement of the country, and that the origin of many of them had passed out of mind.

Again, I am made to say a similar class of titles had been "extensively" litigated in Texas. I said "extensively." Scarcely any one but the reporters for the Globe would use such a word in such a connection.

Again, I am made to say, "I assert that, under the Constitution of the United States, we had no power to force upon men the necessity of adjusting their titles. My statement was, that under the Constitution of the United States we had no power to force men to readjust perfect titles."

These are some of the errors I see in the report of those remarks, and, as you see, do me great injustice. I have before made verbal complaint to you of a garbled report of my remarks on another subject, and I trust I shall not have to complain of the same thing again. Will you give this correction a place in the Globe? Very respectfully,

JOHN C. RIVES, Esq.

JOHN H. REAGAN.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 25, 1858.

Prayer by the Rev. F. SWENTZEL.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATORS FROM MINNESOTA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary of the Senate has asked the direction of the Presiding Officer as to the time at which the compensation of the Senators from Minnesota shall commence. The Chair supposes that, under the law, he would have a right to certify the compensation, and his certificate would be final; but he prefers to lay the matter before the Senate, and if they have no objection, to have it referred to the Judiciary Committee, inasmuch as there has been some irregularity on this question on the admission of new States. The Chair lays before the Senate the letter of the Secretary, and it will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BROWN presented the petition of John Leach, praying to be allowed the benefit of the act of June 7, 1832, granting pensions to soldiers of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MASON. I present a memorial from the corporate authorities of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, setting forth certain grievances that have resulted to their town by reason of former legislation of Congress, and remonstrating more particularly against a proposition now before the Senate to withdraw a portion of the corporate territory from the limits of the corporation. For information, and as the memorial comes from a very respectable body of our own citizens near at hand, I move that it lie on the table, and be printed.

The memorial was ordered to lie on the table; and the motion to print was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, it was Ordered, That W. W. Cox have leave to withdraw the papers relating to his claim.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Jane Maltby, submitted an adverse report.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Matthew Flausburgh, submitted an adverse report.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 232) for the relief of Margaret Whitehead, reported it without amendment.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph G. Heaton, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed; and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Miles Judson, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 407) for the relief of Miles Judson, surety on the official bond of the late Purser Andrew D. Crosby. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

REPORT RECOMMITED.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Robert Morris, together with the adverse report in the case, be recommended to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 407) to authorize the city of Washington to distribute and use the water soon to be introduced therein from the Potomac river; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

EXPENDITURES IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BROWN submitted the following resolutions; which were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior cause to be prepared and laid before Congress, at the opening of the next session, a statement of all the expenditures from the national Treasury for public and private purposes in the District of Columbia, (excluding the salaries of public officers,) from the time the seat of Government was located at Washington to the close of the present fiscal year, specifying the object for which each expenditure was made, and arranging each under its appropriate head, as near as may be; and

Resolved, further, That the said Secretary be requested to have prepared a table showing the number of town lots originally owned by the United States in the city of Washington, the number sold and the sum for which they were sold, the number reserved, and their value: and that he also include in his report a statement of the assessed value of individual property in the city of Washington for the year 1858, and the value of the Government property, excluding the public archives and books.

PAY OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. IVERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to furnish the Senate with a statement showing the amount which would be required to cover the additional pay of such of the retired naval officers whose cases have been acted upon by the late naval courts of inquiry and the President, and who have been advanced to a higher grade or position as to pay than the one assigned to them by the late "retiring board," but who have not been restored to the active list; the said estimate being based upon the hypothesis that such officers be paid according to their present position, (either furlough or leave of absence,) from the time of their retirement to the date of their advancement, deducting any sums which they may have respectively received during said interval; and that he also transmit to the Senate a list of such officers, with the position assigned them by the "retiring board," and the one now held by them.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 99) to amend "An act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind," approved February 16, 1857.

Also, that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 248) regulating municipal elections in the city of Washington.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 32) making an appropriation to pay the expenses of the several investigating committees of the House of Representatives.

And a bill (H. R. No. 549) to provide for the lighting with gas certain streets across the Mall.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A subsequent message announced that the Speaker had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 99) to amend the "Act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind," approved February 16, 1857; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. STUART. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (H. R. No. 300) declaring the title to land warrants in certain cases; but it will be first necessary to obtain the return of the bill from the House of Representatives. I move, therefore, that the Secretary request the return of the bill from the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to. Subsequently, the bill was received from the House of Representatives, and the motion to reconsider was entered.

NANCY SERENA.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Nancy Serena, have directed me to make a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill. I should be very much obliged to the Senate if they would consider this bill at the present time. There can no objection to it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which proposes to place the name of Nancy Serena, widow of Joseph Serena, on the pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars a month, from July 15, 1854, to continue during her natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. BIGLER. I ask the consent of the Senate at this time, as there seems to be no pressing business, to pass the joint resolution of the House (No. 26) in reference to the public buildings in Philadelphia. It is important that that measure should be adopted at an early day.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 26) authorizing the arrangement and disposal of public buildings in the city of Philadelphia, which the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads reported with an amendment, to strike out all after the resolving clause, and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, be, and are hereby, authorized to decide whether the custom-house at Philadelphia shall remain in its present location, or whether public convenience and interests require that the location of the custom-house be changed to the ground and building purchased of the Bank of Pennsylvania, by authority of the law of the 2d of August, 1854, for the purposes of a post-office, and the post office be removed to the present custom-house; and also, to decide whether it is best to sell the building and lot of ground now used for the purposes of the United States court, and establish court-rooms in the building of the present custom-house, and they be further authorized and empowered to so arrange the buildings for said offices and purposes as may, in their judgment, best promote the public convenience: Provided, That the expenses incident to such change and arrangement of the buildings shall not exceed the sum already appropriated for any or all of such purposes, and any additional sum that may be received for the building and ground herein authorized to be sold: And provided further, That should it be deemed best to sell the said court-house building and lot of ground, the President of the United States may cause the same to be sold after due public notice.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the resolution to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON TERRITORY LAND DISTRICTS.

Mr. STUART. I wish to ask the indulgence of the Senate for the passage of the bill (S. No. 375) to establish two additional land districts in Washington Territory. It is very important, in order that it may pass the House of Representatives at this session. It will take no time. It is a bill which is very necessary for public business there.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 375) to create two additional land districts in the Territory of Washington.

Mr. STUART. I move to amend the bill by striking out the third section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator that that bill ought not to be taken up now. I have strong objection to the multiplication of land offices, unless some very excellent reasons can be given for it.

Mr. STUART. There is but one land district in the Territory of Washington. It is reported by the Department that it is very necessary the authority to create two more should be given. The papers are all on file, and I have no doubt of the correctness of the statement. It is important that the bill should be passed now, because it should pass the House of Representatives at this session, in order that the necessary arrangements may be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know whether the Committee on Public Lands have thoroughly investigated that matter for themselves. I confess I have been somewhat struck with the multiplication of land offices, and the consequent multiplication of officers. I know we had before the Committee on Finance an estimate sent to us from the Commissioner of the General Land Office of something like one hundred and thirty or forty thousand dollars, merely for office rent and additional clerks in the several land offices in the United States. And many of these land offices were places where very little land was to be sold, and, in fact, where all the lands had been sold, but still the offices are continued with registers, and receivers, and clerks. We have already made three or four additional land offices at this session, and it is now proposed to make two more in the Territory of Washington. I do not know but that it may be necessary; but I very much doubt it.

I will observe, also, that, at the suggestion of the Committee on Finance, a member of it offered a resolution, which went to the Committee on Public Lands, to inquire into the expediency of limiting the increase of the number of land offices, and seeing if some of them could not be dispensed with. The expenses are getting to be enormous. What I ask is, that new land offices, with registers and receivers, rendering necessary rents, additional clerks, &c., shall not be made unless the Committee on Public Lands have for themselves thoroughly examined the matter, and ascertained how much is necessary. The population in the Territory of Washington is yet very small. What the amount of the sales of lands there may be, or the demand for them, I do not know; but I am exceedingly averse to bringing in a bill creating new offices whenever the officer at the head of the land bureau suggests that it is advisable to do it. I think there is a terrible disposition on the part of this Administration to multiply offices everywhere, to get just as many as possible in every possible place where it can be imagined that they are necessary. I should like to see, with all their preaching to us about the necessity of reform, some disposition to do it somewhere; but we have not yet had the first proposition for it. If the Committee on Public Lands themselves have thoroughly examined the subject, and they are unanimous as to the necessity of this matter, I have nothing to say, because it is in their charge; but I wish to ascertain how that fact is.

Mr. STUART. I will say to the honorable Senator from Maine that the Committee on Public Lands have examined this subject, and are unanimously of the opinion that the offices asked for in Washington Territory ought to be granted. It may not be amiss for me to say also that the committee have considered very carefully the resolution which was submitted by a member of the Committee on Finance, and sent to them. The present law not only authorizes the President, but makes it his duty to close the land office in a district where the number of acres falls below one hundred thousand.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He has not done it.

Mr. STUART. I think the honorable Senator will find that he is in error in supposing that there are land offices in instances where there are not lands to sell, except in some cases where they have been authorized by special acts to be continued for special purposes. Such a case exists in Indiana, and in one or two other places; but there is no such general condition of things as the Senator supposes. The Committee on Public Lands, I may say, have considered all these questions carefully. We do not pass them as a matter of course. But it must be obvious to every Senator that, in the new Territories, such as Washington and Kansas and Nebraska, and the newer parts of the country, it is indispensable that new land districts should be established. It does not matter so much what the number of people is, if there is any considerable number. If they have to go three or four hundred miles to a land office, it is a hardship which the Government never sees fit to impose, and never ought to impose. The settlement of the country is facilitated by enabling people, without too much expense, to enter their lands. This case is one in which, in my judgment, the additional offices are indispensable. It is important that the bill should be passed at once, in order that it may pass the House of Representatives at this session. I move to strike out the third section for that reason. That section contains a provision for an appropriation which had better be placed on another bill; and to strike it out will aid the passage of the bill through the House of Representatives. I move to strike out that section in these words:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That to carry the provisions of this law into effect, from and after such period as the President of the United States may deem expedient and necessary, and in the absence of a specific appropriation therefor, such sum as may be required for salaries, office rent, office furniture, tract books, iron safes, and such other necessary and proper incidental expenses as may be sanctioned by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated."

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Can the bill be read the third time to-day without unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes, sir, it can. The bill has been read twice before to-day. It did not receive its second reading to-day, and therefore it can now be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

M. C. GRITZNER.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I desire to withdraw the motion to reconsider, which I entered a few days since in the case of the passage of a bill for the relief of M. C. Gritzner. I have looked at the papers, and I do not think it is worth looking after any further.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to withdraw the motion to reconsider. The Chair hears no objection.

MILES DEVINE.

Mr. CLAY. I objected the other day to the consideration of a bill (S. No. 288) for the relief of Miles Devine. I wish to call it up, as I perhaps prevented its passage at that time. I shall not vote for the bill, but I do not care to prevent its being passed. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 288) for the relief of Miles Devine, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to Miles Devine, of the State of Maine, of $500, for injuries received while in the employment of the United States, and for medical and other expenses incurred in consequence thereof.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS L. DISHARON.

On motion of Mr. POLK, the bill (S. No. 317) for the relief of Thomas L. Disharoon was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to recognize his right to certain land warrants assigned to him.

Mr. POLK. I will state that the bill has been unanimously recommended by the Committee on Private Land Claims, and it is eminently just.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 248) regulating municipal elections in the city of Washington—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (No. 540) to provide for the lighting with gas certain streets across the Mall—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A joint resolution (No. 32) making an appropriation to pay the expenses of the several investigating committees of the House of Representatives—to the Committee on Finance.

The bill of the Senate (No. 227) authorizing the organization of a fire department in the District of Columbia, with the amendment of the House of Representatives, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 341) making an appropriation for repairing and securing the works at the harbor of Chicago, Illinois.

Mr. HUNTER. If that is taken up, will it interfere with the loan bill, at one o'clock?

Mr. SEWARD. The Senator will have an opportunity to move on that subject.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been read three times. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TOOMBS. When this bill was laid aside yesterday, I was about to reply to some observations of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Davis] upon a very important principle connected with this general system of improvements. I am quite satisfied that the construction which I placed upon this clause of the Constitution, then under consideration, was legitimate and proper, and sustained by the debates of the Federal Convention. The Senator from Mississippi is entirely mistaken on two points; first, on the point that the two provisions of the Constitution, which were quoted yesterday, or either of them, had any connection whatever with free trade; and next on the point that there was any distinction between foreign and domestic tonnage.

I find, on examination, that the very construction I gave, and the very argument I used as to these provisions in the Constitution, were in accordance with what was declared by the mover of the clause. Probably, I used his argument on account of my recollection, having read it somewhere before. I will proceed to show the Senator and the Senate that the purposes of it were not with any view to prevent the laying of tonnage duties on vessels going from one port to another of the United States or foreign countries, but to carry out the first clause in preventing any discrimination in favor of the ports of one State over the ports of another State. The clause is:

"No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from any State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another."

This clause was proposed in the convention that formed the Constitution, on the 25th of August. At pages 478-9, volume five of Elliot's Debates on the adoption of the Federal Constitution, as reported by Mr. Madison, we find that—

"Mr. CARROLL and Mr. L. MARTIN expressed their apprehension, and the probable apprehensions of their constituents, that, under the power of regulating trade, the general Legislature might favor the ports of particular States, by requiring vessels destined to or from other States to enter and clear thereat; as vessels belonging or bound to Baltimore to enter and clear at Norfolk," &c.

That is precisely the illustration I gave.

"They moved the following proposition:

"The Legislature of the United States shall not oblige vessels belonging to citizens thereof, or to foreigners, to enter or pay duties or imposts in any other State than in that to which they may be bound, or to clear out in any other than the State in which their cargoes may be laden on board; nor shall any privilege or immunity be granted to any vessel on entering or clearing out, or paying the duties or imposts in one State in preference to another."

This was the language of the clause as first proposed, but afterwards it was simplified and put in its present form. The illustration given by the movers of it shows what the object was. They were apprehensive that vessels bound for Baltimore from foreign ports would be compelled to pay duties at Norfolk, and they wished to prevent that.

"Mr. GORHAM thought such a precaution unnecessary; and that the revenue might be defeated if vessels could run up long rivers, through the jurisdiction of different States, without being required to enter, with the opportunity of landing and selling their cargoes by the way."

"Mr. McHENRY and General PINCKNEY made the following propositions:"

It was a different form, but the same thing in substance.

"These several propositions were referred nem. con., to a committee composed of a member from each State. The committee, appointed by ballot, were Mr. Langdon, Mr. Gorham, Mr. Sherman, Mr. Dayton, Mr. Fitzsimmons, Mr. Randall, Mr. Carroll, Mr. Mason, Mr. Williamson, Mr. Butler, Mr. Few."

At page 483, we find that the committee reported the proposition nearly as it now stands in the Constitution:

"TUESDAY, August 28.

"In Convention.—Mr. SHERMAN, from the committee to whom were referred several propositions on the 25th instant, made the following report; which was ordered to lie on the table:

"That there be inserted after the fourth clause of the seventh section 'nor shall any regulation of commerce or revenue give preference to the ports of one State over those of another, or oblige vessels bound to or from any State to enter, clear, or pay duties in another; and all tonnage duties, imposts, and excises, laid by the Legislature, shall be uniform throughout the United States.'"

The question was voted upon, as we find at page 503, and disposed of:

"The report of the grand committee of eleven, made by Mr. Sherman, was then taken up.

"On the question to agree to the following clause, to be inserted after article seven, section four:

"Nor shall any regulation of commerce or revenue give preference to the ports of one State over those of another."

"Agreed to nem. con.

"On the clause—

"Or oblige vessels, bound to or from any State, to enter, clear, or pay duties in another."

"Mr. MADISON thought the restriction would be inconvenient, as in the river Delaware, if a vessel cannot be required to make entry below the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania.

"Mr. FITZSIMMONS admitted that it might be inconvenient, but thought it would be a greater inconvenience to require vessels, bound to Philadelphia, to enter below the jurisdiction of the State.

"Mr. GORHAM and Mr. LANGDON contended that the Government would be so fettered by this clause as to defeat the good purpose of the plan. They mentioned the situation of the trade of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, the case of Sandy Hook, which is in the State of New Jersey, but where precautions against smuggling into New York ought to be established by the General Government.

"Mr. McHENRY said, the clause would not screen a vessel from being obliged to take an officer on board, as a security for due entry, &c.

"Mr. CARROLL was anxious that the clause should be agreed to. He assured the House that this was a tender point in Maryland.

"Mr. JENIFER urged the necessity of the clause in the same point of view.

"On the question for agreeing to it, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, ay—3; New Hampshire, South Carolina, no—2.

"The word 'tonnage' was struck out nem. con., as comprehended in 'duties.'

"On the question on the clause of the report, 'and all duties, imposts, and excises laid by the Legislature shall be uniform throughout the United States,' it was agreed to nem. con."

Thus we see that the precise object as expressed, and, I think, very plainly expressed, in that clause, and the reason of the mover, and it was followed throughout in the debates, was, that a vessel coming from a foreign or domestic port, and especially one from a domestic port, should not be compelled to enter, to clear, or to pay duties in any other port than that from whence it sailed, or to which it was sailing. That, and that alone, was the object, as expressed in all the debates, and I think that is the fair construction of the language. Perhaps it is not quite so explicit as the original proposition, because that contained some more words, and they abridged it; but still, the meaning is the same. It can by no possibility mean anything else.

I come next to the clause of the Constitution as to tonnage duties, under which, I hold, it is in the power of Congress to authorize the different States to levy tonnage duties for the purpose of internal improvements and for lights. That was the express reason assigned for the introduction of that clause. The language is not only very clear, but this object was assigned as the reason by the person introducing the clause. The clause of the Constitution under which I claimed that power was this:

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage," &c.

The only dispute in the convention, when it was moved for that purpose, was, whether or not it should be done without the consent of Congress. Some were of the opinion that, for the purpose of keeping up light-houses and improvements of ports, the States ought to have the power. Gouverneur Morris was of the opinion that they had it without the clause. Mr. Madison, in his argument, said there was doubt as to whether they had this authority, because the power over commerce was entirely, and ought to be, in the hands of the Federal Government. Although the convention admitted that the States had power, the only question was on putting in the words "without the consent of Congress." The Senate will find the debate on that branch of the subject on page 548 of Elliot's Debates, volume five:

"Mr. McHENRY and Mr. CARROLL moved, that 'No State shall be restrained from laying duties of tonnage for the purpose of clearing harbors and erecting light-houses.'"

"Colonel MASON, in support of this, explained and urged the situation of the Chesapeake, which peculiarly required expenses of this sort.

"Mr. GOVERNOR MORRIS. The States are not restrained from laying tonnage as the Constitution now stands. The exception proposed will imply the contrary, and will put the States in a worse condition than the gentleman [Colonel MASON] wishes.

"Mr. MADISON. Whether the States are now restrained from laying tonnage duties, depends on the extent of the power 'to regulate commerce.' These terms are vague, but seem to exclude this power of the States. They may certainly be restrained by treaty. He observed that there were other objects for tonnage duties, as the support of seamen, &c. He was more and more convinced that the regulation of commerce was in its nature indivisible, and ought to be wholly under one authority.

"Mr. SHERMAN. The power of the United States to regulate trade being supreme, can control interferences of the State regulations, when such interferences happen; so that there is no danger to be apprehended from a concurrent jurisdiction.

"Mr. LANGDON insisted that the regulation of tonnage was an essential part of the regulation of trade, and that the States ought to have nothing to do with it.

"On motion 'that no State shall lay any duty on tonnage without the consent of Congress'—

"New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, South Carolina, ay—6; Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, no—4; Connecticut divided."

"The remainder of the paragraph was then remodeled and passed, as follows, namely:

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign Power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay."

It is evident that the very clauses under which I claim the power, were put in this shape expressly for the purpose of enabling the States to clear out harbors. I think the gentleman from Mississippi deviates from the usual rule of construction, at least of the school to which he and I belong, when he has to interpolate into this clause a word on one branch of his argument, to make it "domestic tonnage." He seems to entertain the idea that you could not lay a duty on foreign tonnage, according to his reply to my friends from Louisiana and Illinois, but could on domestic tonnage. The whole argument on the first clause, to which I referred, was as to domestic ships sailing from one port to another; but the clause was made so as to embrace not only ships sailing from one port of the United States to another, but ships from foreign ports.

Congress is bound, under this clause of the Constitution, and that is what it was introduced for, to establish proper offices for the entry, payment of duties, and clearance of ships at Baltimore instead of at Norfolk. The same is the case at Philadelphia. She has a right to clear her ships at Philadelphia, and not at Wilmington. She has a right to pay her duties and make her entry at Philadelphia, and not at Wilmington. The framers of the Constitution believed that under the general power to regulate commerce, if there were no restriction, this Government might compel a ship bound for Baltimore to enter and pay duties at Norfolk. I think those who moved the proposition were right. But for this clause that might be done, and then the Federal Government would not have had to establish custom-houses, and ports of entry, and ports of delivery, in the different States. It might have been more convenient to the Government, and clearly more economical, to require all vessels bound for the port of Alexandria, the port of Georgetown, the port of Baltimore, and the port of Richmond, to enter and pay all the duties at Norfolk. That would save us a vast amount of expense. If we had that power, we ought certainly to have used it to compel the vessels to enter and pay duty there, and then go on their voyage to other points. But the States, jealous that the power would be exercised by the Federal Government in some shape or form, made the first clause, to which I have alluded, with no other view in the world but to prevent the Federal Government doing it—not to prevent State action, not to prevent them, as erroneously supposed, to impose duties and burdens.

My honorable friend from Mississippi is mistaken as to the case he put of Charleston and Savannah. I cannot conceive a case in which it would be to the interest of Savannah to prevent a vessel from Charleston coming into that port. I think there is no conceivable case in which she would want to lay prohibitory duties. In fact, I have ascertained that the States which got the right to lay tonnage duties for the improvement of their harbors, would not use it, for the reason that it gave a preference to rival ports. There is no difficulty with Savannah. She abandoned her power and asked you to take away the wrecks which you had put in the Savannah river, and not let her tax her commerce for it, because she said, that if a foreign vessel coming from Liverpool has to pay tonnage duties in Savannah, and none in Charleston, it would be an encouragement of Charleston, and a discouragement of Savannah. I cannot conceive a state of things in which it is against the interest of the people of any particular port in any State to prevent the entry of ships from another State.

Again, it is a sufficient answer to say that without this clause of the Constitution they have no such power, and this clause is given for no other purpose but to lay tonnage duties by the consent of Congress. It was at first expressed by the mover in different language, and it was afterwards put into its present shape, with the avowed object of allowing the States to clear out their harbors and put up their lights. That was a legitimate business, and it ought to be followed now, and it would be followed, as I stated yesterday, but for the general disposition throughout the United States—which is common to all people—for the most enterprising portion of the community to put the expenses of their business on the least enterprising. That is the case at the North; it is the case at the South; it is the case in England; it is the case the world over. In England they improve their harbors, and they charge the commerce benefited by the improvement. Any gentleman who will take the trouble to look at their system will find it to be so. Tonnage duties are levied there; each place pays its own expenses. Their lighthouse system does not cost the English Government a cent, and harbor improvements do not cost that Government a cent, because they have come to this great principle of justice: they do not allow capital to put the expense of its business on labor. How is it now in New York? I would take Savannah if that was as large a place, because the illustration I give is not on account of the locality of New York. Is it just that the great body of the industrious laboring people of New York, the men who toil by the day, and who pay duties on imports, who pay revenue to this Government, should be taxed for the payment of the light dues of the millionaire that owns a ship, or port duties for the benefit of an insurance office in New York? Is there anything in the relative condition of the different classes of people in New York which can justify that? I recollect seeing, a day or two ago, a statement—I do not know how authentic it was, but it purported to be taken from the books—that there are less than thirty thousand tax-payers on the books of New York city, which has a population of six hundred thousand inhabitants. If you assume that there are six persons in the family of each of the thirty thousand tax-payers, there would not be one third of the population of New York that have any property at all which is taxable under the local law. Four hundred thousand of the people of New York have no visible taxable property, but they are largely taxed by this Government in their consumption, what they eat, and drink, and wear, to lessen the burden of millionaires in commerce, men who own ships and have capital. This is unjust—as unjust to them as it is to the people in Georgia or Vermont—for the rule is universal. Persons who own ships, the insurance offices, and those who are dealing in capital, should pay the expenses of their own business, and not put them upon the toiling millions.

I recollect—I speak from memory—that I saw last fall the report of a very valuable society for the improvement of the condition of the poor, in which it was alleged that one sixth of the entire population of the city of New York lived on public charity; that three sixths of the residue were so near it as to be unable to contribute to that one sixth, and therefore that the other two sixths paid for supporting the one sixth; that is, every two of the inhabitants were charged with the support of a third. I do not think there is anything so very remarkable in the results of that system, although it is free labor, and they are free people, which should encourage this Government, or should invite the Senate and the House of Representatives of this great country to take burdens off the wealthy, off the ship-owner, off the capitalist, to put them on the toiling millions, one sixth of whom are already on the parish, and three sixths of them so near it that they are unable to contribute one cent to alleviate the woes of their poorer fellow-citizens.

That is the condition of things there, and it has resulted from the tendency of Government—and I believe it is more so in a republican Government than in any other—to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer. The rich are necessarily the enterprising and the intelligent; they have the means of doing it, and their whole object is to use the Government in order to get at the public Treasury. What is the gold in the public Treasury, after all? In its last analysis, it is but the sweat of the poor. The object is to take this sweat of the poor from the public Treasury, and to give it to the persons who have the largest means, who are engaged in commerce, and in various other occupations more lucrative, of course; that is, to take from poverty and give to wealth.

I do not oppose the improvement of this country. No man in the United States would go further than I would to develop the resources of this great people, or give Government aid to any extent allowed by the Constitution, and that was just to all. These are the only two limits to any efforts of mine to improve this country, and every part of it: show me the power, and show me the just means. I think the system of tonnage duties is a just means; and hence I attributed more importance to it than the casual remark of my friend from Mississippi would otherwise have attracted. I think it a just and legitimate means that these people should have the right to lay tonnage duties to improve their rivers and harbors. Frequently the States have done so. New York has done it with some of her rivers. She early commenced the system, to her great credit, which has resulted to her general prosperity. She made artificial communications where she had no rivers, and where she had defective natural ones; she improved them; but she taxed those who used them, and thus restored to the public Treasury what she had taken from it. I am content that each place should tax the tonnage coming into it for its own improvement. Let New Orleans do it, for instance. I think the Mississippi river ought to be improved, and I cannot see the difficulty my friend from Mississippi does about a vessel starting below St. Louis, and stopping above New Orleans. They can be made to pay in any collection district where they stop. They can be made to pay at the point whence they sail, or the point where they arrive. There is no difficulty that I see, no risk in making those who use that great highway pay for its improvement. The fact that its tonnage is great, that the wealth which floats on its bosom is great, would make the tax inconsiderable; and having a remote interest even on those waters, I should be glad to see a system adopted by which the wealth that annually floats on the bosom of that mighty river should be tolled for the purpose of adding security to human life, and security to property on those waters; but I desire it to be done legitimately. I do not want to tax the man in Vermont or in New Hampshire for the purpose of aiding to float my cotton on the bosom of the Mississippi. If my cotton floats there I am willing to pay the expense of it; if I ship my produce down the Mississippi river, and snags interfere, I see no reason why I should go to the poor man on the hills of Vermont, and ask him to toll his little lambs to float the avails of my industry to the great ports of the world. It is unjust. Such a system is injurious to every section. It is local. It injures New York as much as it injures other people. To levy a tax on the people of the State of New York to improve the harbor of Oswego, or on the people of Illinois to tax the harbor of Chicago, would not be submitted to an instant in those States without imposing a toll on those benefited. No man would dare to rise in the State Legislature and propose so great an iniquity; and yet that would be more unjust than it is here to charge it on this Government, because it might be said that as you improved the value of property at Oswego and at Chicago, you benefited, incidentally, the people of the whole State, and made it more capable of paying taxes. That is not true in regard to our indirect system of taxes by which we support this Government. A man may have millions of property in Chicago, and millions of property in Oswego, and yet may not pay one cent to the public revenue of the United States. I know that is the case with a great portion of the richest men with us—careful men. They make at home everything, or nearly everything, they use. They make their clothes at home, which are spun and wove by their domestics, or oftentimes by their own wives and daughters. They pay no duty on their sugar. They distill their own whisky, and make brandy out of their own peaches. They do not pay you any duties on what they eat or drink or wear; therefore they can defy your indirect taxation, although they may own millions of property. It is not so, however, with the great mass, especially with the poor. They must pay. A man who is a mechanic must pay you duties for what he wears and drinks and eats; and so it is with every man who is not a farmer.

I say that the system of tonnage duties pointed out by the Constitution is free from difficulty, and it ought to be resorted to. As I remarked yesterday, its opponents have generally been those who wished the Government to make their improvements and pay for them, in order that they might put the expenditures on the public Treasury. Of course, in this remark I do not include the honorable Senator from Mississippi. If they contribute their taxes in proportion to other people, and draw out thousands where others draw out nothing, they understand how that works. Such a system is against the interest of all classes, except the particular locality where the improvement is made. It is unjust to the rural districts in New York and Illinois, as it is in Georgia and Arkansas. It is unjust even to the working people in the very towns where these improvements are made. The only possible incidental advantage they could get, if any, would be increased employment growing out of the prosperity of the town; and that is so infinitesimal as not to be ascertainable. You take money out of the pockets of the laboring millions to pay for the lights that show the pathway leading into port for the ships of France and England, and our own country. It is part of the same system, and it is unjust.

The principle for which I contend is a sound one, and it ought to be adopted; and I say it is practicable even in regard to the Mississippi river, that "inland sea" which led astray even the great, bright intellect of South Carolina, on an idea of public necessity to devise some scheme by which that great work could be done. The pressure was immense; the population concerned amounted to millions; the interest was terrific; and he sought to find some mode by which he could detach that great interest from the thousand schemes of speculation in the United States; but they all stand on the same great principle. There is no power in this Government to do it. Congress can give them the power to pay the expenses of their own improvements, and that is the only rightful and legitimate mode on which these great improvements should be carried on.

Mr. DURKEE. Will the honorable gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TOOMBS. With great pleasure.

Mr. DURKEE. Admit that the ship-owner pays the tonnage duty, does it not enter into the price of the goods, and therefore necessarily fall on the consumer?

Mr. TOOMBS. That is one element of price, but very often it is the least, and the ship-owner knows it; for he would rather you should pay it than he himself. It is one element of price, and will enter into it ceteris paribus.

Mr. DAVIS. I have listened to the Senator from Georgia, with attention and interest. He has sustained his construction of the particular clause in relation to vessels clearing from one port to another with his usual ability, and with an array of authority which I will not gainsay. So far, then, from continuing the argument with him on that point, I admit that he has sustained his construction of that clause of the Constitution. I think, however, when he assumes that the clause admits of no other construction, is capable of no extension, applicable to no other case, he assumes more than the authority he has read authorizes. Every remark he read in the discussion of this clause of the Constitution clearly referred to other than domestic tonnage; and if he will follow his examinations still further, to the first discussion which arose in Congress, in 1790 I think, he will there find that Mr. Madison, in introducing a proposition, attempted to establish a scale of tonnage duties, and that that scale of tonnage duties looked to the purpose of building up American shipping by relieving it of the burden which foreign ships should bear; and that, even when navigating the ocean, coming from a foreign port to a port of the United States, the purpose was declared to be to discriminate in favor of American ships, or ships owned wholly or in part by American citizens, and against those which were termed foreign bottoms.

But, whether I be correct in that or not, I think the other clause of the Constitution to which he passes to sustain his position, is one on which I can make a satisfactory answer. He says it is necessary to resort to that clause of the Constitution which declares that the States shall not, without the consent of Congress, lay tonnage duties; and he infers from the language there employed that the States were to lay tonnage duties on whatever they pleased. I think, spread broadcast over the whole Constitution, is the great principle of free trade between the States. As I recollect the language of Mr. Franklin, he said the trade between the States should be as free as that between the counties of England. It was the spirit which moved the convention that framed the Constitution, and entered into the State conventions by whom it was ratified. In the same section, and in the paragraph next preceding, my friend from Georgia will find in the Constitution lying before him, it is provided that no State, without the consent of Congress, shall lay any duty upon imports or exports, except so far as to execute their inspection laws; and that, if the consent is given, the net proceeds shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States. Then follows the provision that no State shall enter into any contract or alliance, or shall keep armies, or shall lay duties on tonnage except with the consent of Congress; the difference between the two clauses being only that, in the first, the excess of duty is to be paid into the Treasury; and in the second, no provision is made for any excess whatever; and under the very obvious understanding which the Senator has presented, that it was the interest of every port to lay the tonnage duties as low as possible, and no excess was to be anticipated. The power, however, is the same. Now, would it be contended by any one—surely not by a free-trader, not by one whose principles are those of free trade, like the Senator from Georgia—that the first clause gives to a State, with the consent of Congress, the power to lay duties upon imports and exports from another State of the Union? And yet the power is as broad, and is conferred in language almost exactly the same with that which gives them the right to lay duties on tonnage.

It would be unfair to the argument if I omitted to say that the discussion to which I referred to sustain my opinion, was on a bill which did impose some duties on the coastwise trade. My memory does not serve me, and I am not able at this time to pursue the investigation so far as to learn whether the word "coastwise," in that connection, was used as we use it now, to refer to the navigation pursued from one port of the United States to another. I will grant that it did; and if so, then they departed from what I think was the principle that appeared to prevail in all the debates preceding it, by establishing a very small amount of duty upon American tonnage—so small as to sustain the argument under which it was made—to pay the light tax to which the Senator from Georgia referred. In all the discussion, I think the tonnage duty which was in the mind of the convention, and of the Congress which succeeded it, referred to tonnage engaged in foreign trade; and so strongly was this presented by Mr. Jackson, of Georgia, the cotemporary of Mr. Madison, that in counting the amount which was to be received from Georgia from tonnage duties, he excluded American tonnage altogether.

If, then, I am correct, that the power to lay tonnage duties, and the power to lay duties on imports and exports, be exactly the same, so far as a State can exercise it, I think I am sustained in my first proposition, that it was a power not to be exercised against ships belonging to our fellow-countrymen in the United States. Before the Union was formed, tonnage duties were imposed for the purpose of improving harbors, and especially for the establishment of lights. It was continued afterwards for a long time. I do not find anywhere conclusive evidence that it was the intent that they should be imposed, even for that purpose, upon our own shipping; but if I grant all this, (and I do not wish to enter into an argument on a collateral question which really has little or no connection with that before us,) then I ask you how will the tonnage duties be levied on boats navigating rivers; and how will they be collected on those vessels? Tonnage duties, as understood by the framers of the Constitution, and the men who executed it for a long time after, meant duties laid on vessels coming into ports. They were local duties; duties for the improvement of the port, and for the convenience of the vessel which entered the port. Now, sir, when a vessel arrives at New Orleans, will you levy a duty for coming into the port of New Orleans—constructively a port, but in fact a landing made by the hand of nature, and but slightly improved by art? Clearly, that is not the tax you want. That you already impose under the municipal authority, in wharfage tax. You want a tax for the improvement of the river itself; a toll tax, such as we pay on a highway. That is the only tax which would avail anything. The Senator properly describes the vast commerce of that river, and the very light burden which would necessarily be imposed; but I ask again if you are going to impose a duty or tax in any form, for the improvement of the river, how will you collect it in the form of a tonnage duty at a port, as the Senator proposes?

Mr. TOOMBS. There is no sort of difficulty in levying the duty at the port of departure or the port of entry. If the power to levy tonnage duties were granted by Congress to all the States on the line of that commerce to tax on tonnage a quarter of a dollar a ton, if you please, as was done in the State of Georgia, the fund might go into the hands of commissioners for improvement. It is one of the simplest operations in the world. Where the river is all in one State, grant it to the State. Where it is in different States, the act ought to specify the different ports at which they would stop. I see not the least difficulty in it at all; no more than in regard to the foreign trade.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator perhaps finds no difficulty in the comparison he makes. But the Mississippi, as a physical and political problem, presents a vast difficulty, and one which might very well confuse the great intellect of South Carolina. A boat starting from St. Louis, and bound for New Orleans, has a long line of river, the improvement of which is essential to her benefit. Every improvement made upon that whole line of river inures to her advantage in navigating. A tonnage duty collected at New Orleans is the same on that vessel as on one that runs from some landing fifty miles above. Would this be equitable or reasonable? For many miles above, more than fifty, you want nothing for the river; nature has dug it out wide and deep, and there are no snags and no bars to interfere with the navigation. Then you would impose by your tonnage duty the same tax upon this vessel running fifty miles over a river where art could do nothing, that you would impose on another vessel running the extreme distance of the whole navigation of that long river. Upon the theory of the equal distribution of taxation which the Senator has argued, he must see that this would be entirely unjust. Vessels that plow the ocean, when they come into a port and pay port charges, may pay alike, because all the advantage they derive from any artificial improvement is in the port. Here the advantages are not in the port; they are along the whole line of travel. You would have to erect something corresponding to toll-gates if you assimilated it to a road; you would have to collect your taxes from point to point, according to the distance over which the boat had passed—not to lay a tonnage duty in a port to which the boat might be bound, remote or near, as the case might be.

That rivalry of ports to which I referred, was a rivalry growing out of some ill feeling, some jealousy between two places. I selected two in the section to which the Senator and myself belong, because there it would be merely commercial rivalry. He will not fail to perceive—it is not necessary for me to state a case—that rivalry of a much more bitter kind might exist between ports in different sections of the Union, and duties might be imposed for vexatious purposes. I took two ports where I would avoid that question. I did it intentionally; and it is only necessary to suggest it to the Senator's mind, and he will see to what consequences it might run.

The light-house system, as pursued by the United States, is certainly a very liberal one. We make our lights free to foreign and domestic commerce. It imposes a tax, as has been very well described, upon all the people of the United States, because these light-houses are built and supported out of the Treasury of the United States. To change that immediately to a local tax is a question involving so many points for consideration, so many difficulties, that I am not willing to touch it so rudely and hastily as to decide at once that the whole system should be changed. Modifications of it, I think, might well be made. Perhaps it may be possible progressively to reach the point to which the Senator would have us go; but it would be quite unequal to the State of Georgia, to take the case of his own State, after the light-house system is almost perfected in another quarter of the Union, to say that light-houses should now be built on the coast of Georgia, at her own expense. Something of modification may be introduced, something finally to correct what I admit to be an error.

Mr. TOOMBS. Allow me a moment. What is the difficulty in the way of the Government charging those who use the lights? I have no doubt they ought to be under private superintendence; but now, to-day, why should not a duty be levied, as in all other countries in the world, upon the vessels using the lights, to reimburse the cost of keeping them up, as is done in France and England, and all along the Mediterranean? If the Government does build them, why not compel the owners of ships to pay the expense, and thereby throw the burden off poverty on wealth?

Mr. DAVIS. If our system were one of direct taxation, every one would see at once the justice of the proposition; there could be no argument on it. Our system, however, is one of indirect taxation, by which we collect money from the consumption of the country; and the difference there is hardly material. If the importer paid the light tax, he would merely lay that additional tax on the price of the goods he imported, and the consumer would pay it in that form, with interest on the money thus paid. If you were rid of this system of indirect taxation, where all your revenue is collected from the consumer, and thrown back on property and direct taxation, then I suppose there would be no one who admits the equity of the rule which the Senator and myself both recognize, who would not say that the lights should be supported by taxes levied on those who use them. That is one of the difficulties to which I intended to call the attention of the Senator, rather than to elaborate the point, and one of the very many difficulties which surround a sudden change in this system.

The general principles which were announced as the basis upon which the argument of the Senator from Georgia rests, are those which I have always advocated, more feebly than himself, but with the same zeal—the equitable distribution of the burdens of the Government upon all the people of the United States. I would go further, and say that to levy them upon the property of the United States would be, to me, more acceptable than the present system. He has laid down no general principle in which I do not concur. I heartily go with him in a system of taxation on those who derive the benefits of local improvements. I think a system of taxation may be devised, though it is not without difficulty, for the improvement of rivers; but I think a system of tonnage duties, such as is proposed, will be unequal and unjust, and I believe a violation of the right to use the highways of the United States; or it would evade that right in such a form as to render it utterly useless.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not propose to enter at large into the subject of taxation; but having heard the remark of the gentleman from Georgia, and having heard somewhat similar ones heretofore from the honorable Senator, and being in some measure constrained to acknowledge much of weight in them, I am not willing to sit entirely still, and give a merely silent vote, without suggesting, at least, to that gentleman some difficulties that are on my mind in relation to the views he takes.

The problem of a just taxation is a difficult one in any country at any period. It is one which troubles statesmen always. There may be some question, indeed, to determine if it were practicable, what would be a true, genuine, just principle of taxation. I must acknowledge that it seems to me, if it were practicable, a true income tax is the most just tax of any in the world. I say this, though I perceive that in England they seem to be dissatisfied with the income tax which they have had. Take the case the gentleman mentions in regard to the city of New York, where he thinks there are only thirty thousand tax payers out of nearly a million of people. If the tax is laid upon the real estate of the city of New York, who pays it? The Government must always levy its tax, and obtain its money from where the money is. They cannot obtain the money from where it is not. They lay hold of it where they find it. If a tax is laid upon the real estate of the city of New York, who pays it? Why, every man that finds a shelter, I care not how poor he is, and pays for a shelter for himself and family, pays it. It enters into the rents. It is paid by those who occupy the real estate. In theory that is strictly true. I grant the gentleman that, practically, if you carry it out, there may be a leaking out of some of it on the way; but, theoretically, it is true, as his system of taxation is true generally. If his theory of taxation is right, the carrying of it out is equally right, though they both may be practically imperfect. That is, those who occupy must pay. If the tax were laid upon all the lands in the United States, what would be the effect? The produce of that land must sell for so much more as will be necessary to meet it, and the consumers of that produce pay it. So, take it as we may, it comes to the same thing at last.

Now, in relation to this undertaking to lay tonnage duties. I care not whether it be on foreign tonnage, or domestic and foreign tonnage included, for the purpose of making harbor improvements. Practically, it has been found—for it has been tried for some time under that clause of the Constitution—to be what the gentleman suggests; that is, if you lay a duty on the tonnage of vessels entering a particular port, the effect is to drive them to a neighboring port. That has been found to be the effect; and it has been practically abandoned long ago. No such thing exists now. It is an unpleasant business to carry into effect at all in relation to the improvement of a locality.

The Senator from Georgia, in answering the question put by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, is constrained to admit that the amount of the tonnage duty, if levied, would be an element in the price of the article transported in the vessel. That is to say, if all those who trade at that port, and use that port, pay a tonnage duty on their vessels for the purpose of making improvements in it, they will lay a greater price on the freight, and it finally goes on the article to be paid by the user of that article, let him live where he may. Besides, money must be raised to make these improvements, if they are to be made at all; and it is probably better to spread the contribution of that money over a larger space, to view the commerce of the United States as a unit, for the benefit of the whole United States, and if it needs the improvement of a harbor there, or a stream there, or any other particular locality, it is for the interest of this general concern. The ship-owner of England, if you please, is interested in improving the harbor of Savannah; and the consumer, user, and owner of the property which is to be carried out and in there, to and from all parts of the United States, has an interest in that. It will make, therefore, less disturbance, be more equal upon the whole, to distribute this contribution over the whole mass of commerce, than to undertake to levy it upon a particular locality. For that reason it has been found most desirable to take the money from the general contribution, from the Treasury, which is made of moneys levied upon the whole importations of the country, and there collected in one mass—to take it from there as from a common stock, to make these local improvements, which are for the general benefit, for the national interest, and none others should be made. Nor do I see that this subject should at all properly call forth the suggestion, whether it would not be best to levy all our taxes by direct taxation. That would not equalize this any more or any less.

Now, in relation to the light-house system, that is precisely of the same character. The largest use which is made of the light-house system is in the coasting trade, by our own coasters, who have more benefit from it than the foreign commerce; and this coasting being for the keeping up of intercourse and interchange of commodities, and sustaining the proper relations between the different parts of the United States to render them a united and common people, this expense had better be contributed out of the common stock.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am sorry, sir, that the time which we have to devote to this subject does not allow a little more extended discussion of it than I think we are likely to have. It is a very interesting one—evidently so by the uncommon attention now paid to it by the Senate. We have a silence and an attention in the Hall now rarely exhibited. I cannot pretend, at this time, to go at all into an examination of those very interesting theories of political economy, and the philosophy of taxation, which have been suggested by gentlemen, and to which I have listened with a great deal of pleasure. I desire, however, to say one or two words in relation to a proposition discussed in committee, and which has been adverted to by the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Georgia.

In relation to the improvement of the western rivers, I had a bill before the Committee on Commerce in which I felt a deep interest. I believed that if there were any means by which we could put the improvement of the western rivers under a system of contract by which certain sections of the rivers should be kept free from accidental obstructions which now accumulate, such a system would produce the result we have all long aimed at, and would prove eminently efficient for the purposes of the commerce of the interior of the country—the western States. When that proposition was discussed in committee, the Senator from Georgia renewed those objections to the improvement of rivers and harbors by the General Government out of the common Treasury, which he has so ably and earnestly enforced on the Senate; and he suggested, at the same time, his views as to the expediency and practicability of raising the necessary fund for the purpose, which he admitted to be eminently useful, by some system of tolls or tonnage on the western waters. I was instructed by the committee to examine the subject and frame a scheme, if I could, by which the necessary funds for that purpose might be raised out of some such source. Notwithstanding my firm conviction of the power of the General Government to devote such portion of the revenues as it may deem proper to facilitate commerce in this way, I was disposed to yield to the suggestion in the hope that, by mutual concession, we might agree on some system by which this long disputed question should at last be settled. I took the papers to my house and studied the subject carefully, and I was utterly unable to devise any practical system. The considerations were so numerous, the difficulties which presented themselves, under any possible theory, were so complicated, that I abandoned it in despair. The Senator from Mississippi has adverted to some of them.

The proposition of the Senator from Georgia, as a question of pure ethics, is undoubtedly correct. Where money is expended for the purpose of a particular improvement of this character, the cost of making that improvement, and the cost of maintaining it with proper efficiency, ought to be supported by those who benefit by it. To a certain extent, his proposition is not correct in my judgment; and it is in this: he seems to consider that only that commerce which is borne over these waters is benefited by the particular improvement; whereas, I think it has been successfully demonstrated by the Senator from Vermont that the benefits indirectly are reaped by many other sections of the Union, and by all classes of consumers throughout the country.

Now, sir, as to a system, observe the difficulty. The Senator from Mississippi has correctly stated that there are parts of the Mississippi river which require no artificial improvement; there are others which do require that improvement. The classes of boats that run over that river are different, and require different depths of water. Will you tax the small boat, the stern-wheeler, which only draws two or three feet, and which requires no improvement, for improvements made with a view to render the navigation practicable for vessels of a larger class? Will you establish some scheme by which you shall divide the boats that navigate the Mississippi into different classes, and separate the navigation of different parts of the river, and then proportion your tonnage duties to the different classes of vessels, and to the portions of the river over which they make their voyages? These things are almost impracticable.

Again, in many parts of the river, for short distances, even where difficulties exist in the navigation, there are packets that repeat their voyages sometimes weekly, sometimes semi-weekly. Will you put a tonnage duty on those packets for every voyage, every time they go in and out of port? If you do, you will absorb the entire value of the vessel in a single season in the tonnage duty. If you do not, you will find it absolutely impracticable to make your rules and regulations such as to do exact justice to all. Will you impose your tonnage duty by the year or by the month? There again you meet the same difficulties and the same class of difficulties. Some vessels pass through the Mississippi river out into the Gulf of Mexico, and go to navigate the waters of the Alabama and the other rivers to the east of the Mississippi, when the waters are high, and return to the Mississippi at seasons of the year when the navigation is closed upon the lesser streams. Will you tax a vessel that employs the navigation of the Mississippi for the entire year the same amount, and no more, than you impose as a tax on vessels that only use the Mississippi a portion of the year? Will you tax, as the Senator from Mississippi has observed, boats that are doing their business on parts of the river that require no improvement? How is this vast and complicated system to be carried out? In my judgment the difficulties are insuperable. The difficulties to which this new system would give rise are greater than those that already exist.

What then are we to do? Are we to admit that we have a frame of government under which obstructions may be accumulated in our large navigable courses, in which the commerce of the country may be impeded in its most vital branches, in its most important elements? Are we to admit that, under our frame of government, there is no power either in the State or General Government for the improvement of those streams, which are not simply local in their character, but which bear on their surface the commerce—I was going to say, of empires? We cannot admit that; and we are driven, at least by the absolute necessity of the case, to yield the principle that the General Government, under our theory, has the power—a power greatly liable to abuse, I admit; a power that has been abused formerly, and up to the present time, I admit; a power exceedingly difficult to be guarded, I admit; but a power, in my judgment, indisputable—the power of improving its rivers and harbors under the general grant of authority to regulate commerce, not only between this country and foreign nations, but between the several States of the Union.

I agree, sir, with the suggestions both of the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Vermont, that this system of improvement, imperfect as it may appear, however formidable may seem the objections that may be raised against it by gentlemen of the power and ability of the Senator from Georgia, still, after all, does that kind of justice which was called in ancient times rustic justice. It is not exact; it is not perfect; human institutions do not permit it so to be; but, upon the whole, it taxes the consumer of every part of the country for those facilities which bring the article that he consumes home to him at a cheaper rate than he would otherwise receive it, and carries his produce away upon the same system. A system thus established, operating by the General Government in all parts of the United States, liable, as I said before, to many abuses, and requiring great and careful checks, is, in my judgment, after all, the only one practicable in its character, and the one upon which the American people must eventually settle down.

Mr. TOOMBS. If anything could satisfy me more than another of the unanswerable soundness of the position I have always occupied on this question, it is the absolute impossibility, not to say difficulty, of even presenting, in my judgment, a plausible reply. I will take up the arguments as they are presented, with a great deal of fairness, I admit. The main argument of the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Louisiana is, that they find great difficulty in apportioning the benefit among the men who use the improvement; and inasmuch as they may not be able, from the difficulties of the case, to do exact justice among them, they will adopt a system that is the furthest possible from any justice. As they may do one of the parties who uses this improvement injustice, by levying too much out of the small boat man, for instance, rather than the big boat man, they put it on the man who has no boat at all; they put it on the man in Vermont, who raises wool.

Mr. COLLAMER. I suppose the honorable Senator does not mean to do me injustice?

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not.

Mr. COLLAMER. My idea was, that, to force these local improvements which are of general interest to be made by local contributions, was saddling that portion of the country to the injury of commerce generally. It injures those people, and shuts out others from all connection with them, by having tonnage duties laid in their harbors. My view was, that we had better consider the commerce of the country as a general unit, and levy upon the commerce of the country any such contributions as are necessary for local improvements, for the benefit of that general commerce.

Mr. TOOMBS. The gentleman has got out of the difficulty by assuming that it is the general interest. The answer is, that it is not the general interest. He assumes that which is not true. I should like to know how a man who clips wool in Vermont, and sends it to Boston or New York, or to a factory in Vermont, is benefited by having commodities sent cheaply down the Mississippi river?

Mr. COLLAMER. I put my answer thus: that wool will sell better to the manufacturer of cloths in proportion as those cloths can be carried to and sold in the different portions of the United States. We have an interest in having our vessels go into the harbor of Savannah for the purpose of carrying our woollens there, and bringing your cottons back.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have stated the argument just as you have. On the principle which both the Senators state, it is to our advantage to open the ports of every civilized country in the world, for they can get there cheaper. On that argument, it is just as much our interest to make a railroad in Russia, or clean out the Volga, as the Mississippi; not to the same extent, but the principle is the same, because they can bring their commodities better to us and exchange them for ours, and we are benefited. The same principle would warrant you in giving me out of the Federal Treasury, by a vote of the Senate, $10,000, because somebody would get the benefit of it—I should expend money more freely; I should buy more clothes and probably more food. But that principle is a very great mistake.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Permit me to say to the Senator that I take the very illustration he now offers to us. Have we not, for years past, without question, appropriated money for the survey of the rivers of distant countries, with a view of opening avenues to commerce? Do we not pay for that out of the general fund? Have we a right to vote that money for the exploration of the navigation of foreign rivers, and not spend any money at home? I think the illustration the Senator offers supports our views.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will answer that argument when I come to it. The Senator from Vermont says it is very difficult to get a just system of taxation. I admit it. I admit that it is next to impossible in human institutions to get a just system of taxation; but in every question that comes before me, it is my duty as a Senator, and as a citizen, to approximate that point as near as possible; but the moment he sees there is difficulty, he gets as far off from it as possible. That is the difference between us. Because it is difficult to apportion the burden among the people who own ships, or send their produce down the Mississippi, he will put it on the whole people. I will take my own case and that of his wool clipper. My cotton goes down the Mississippi river; his wool does not. Inasmuch as there is a difficulty between me and another man as to how the burden shall be divided among us, we say we will take in this wool-grower in Vermont. It is true, we send our produce cheaper to market; we are richer; quod erat demonstrandum, he is richer; the whole nation is. That is the argument; it has no other extent than that—I am richer, the nation is richer, therefore he is richer! That is the principle the Senator goes on. It is a system that destroys all distinctions of individual property. It is in principle an annihilation of individual property. I say that inasmuch as you cannot get at a correct system of taxation, I will approximate as near to a correct system as the defects of human knowledge, and the circumstances by which I am surrounded will allow me to do; and therefore, as a fundamental principle of human justice, I will apportion all the burdens of the Government on the persons who get the benefits, as exactly and equally as I can. Though it is imperfect, if I am legislating to that point I am legislating justly; and if I depart from it I am legislating unjustly. These two Senators advocate unjust legislation. It cannot be defended on the forum of justice. They admit that abstractly my proposition is true. Sir, it is as true in the concrete as it is in the abstract; and every particle of injustice that you do not relieve where you can, you are the perpetrators of. As I remarked when I was up before, there has been a great effort in all ages and in all countries for the enterprising, the intelligent, the powerful, and the rich, to cast their burdens upon the poor, and to take their profits to themselves; and that is just exactly the system. Here is a lawyer in New York who has a correspondence of a thousand dollars a year, and here is a wool-grower in Vermont who perhaps sends and receives three letters in the course of a year. Suppose the lawyer should say to him, "we will put our letters in a common box and divide the expense between us;" when you went to put your hands into the pockets of the wool-grower, he would show you that he understood it. I have no doubt they understand this.

But the Senator from Vermont says that the system I propose has been tried and abandoned. Sir, it never was abandoned. It is true, that laying such a duty is some burden; and if the benefit is not greater than the burden, it will not be resorted to, and ought not to be. If you give Baltimore the right to levy tonnage duties to a certain amount fixed by Congress, and the benefit of her commerce is not equal to that burden, she would not lay it. There is some injury, I admit. If the money is taken out of the public Treasury, there is not a spot in the United States where the ship-owners and the merchants will not ask you to give them greater facilities; but make them pay for it themselves, and they will count both sides—the advantages on the one side, and the disadvantages on the other. Those places that supposed the money they were going to expend would cause a greater injury to their commerce than the improvement would benefit, would not ask the power. Those who believed the money which they levied would do a greater advantage to their commerce than they would lose by it, would ask for it; and that is the way it ought to be.

They abandon it when they could put their hands in the public Treasury; they cry "give," "give," like the horse-leech. They say "give," when you have an abundant Treasury; they say "give," when you are bankrupt; everywhere, at all times, in season and out of season, at the beginning of the session, in the middle of the session, at the end of the session, the cry is the same. They do not come here to beg you to give them the right to tax themselves, but they beg you to plunder the public Treasury for their benefit. They understand it. They are very easily satisfied with arguments. I have no doubt that by the mercantile classes, the people benefited by this system, the arguments of the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Vermont will be considered unanswerable. It is very convenient for the company that runs steamships to Aspinwall, doing a business of four or five millions a year, to say to other people, "you are benefited as well as we are; pay our lightage into New York harbor." I warrant you will never get a vote from them to make those who use lights pay for them. That is the way the question has worked in England, and in all countries; and I have no doubt of the result here when the country becomes more enlightened, and the great mass of the people come to understand the extent to which they are plundered. I would as soon trust the citizens of Vermont on this question as those of Georgia. I would go with the Senator from Vermont before the people there upon it, and I have no doubt I should defeat him before them. No intelligent population in the world would ever submit to the proposition that they should contribute from their mite to pay the business of another class on the idea of general benefit to the whole. No man ever did it voluntarily. Whenever the public benefit is indivisible, like levying war, and armies and navies, where the whole is bound at any and every cost to defend each and every part, then it goes upon another principle. The public defense is indivisible. You cannot apportion the burden except in one way; that is by taxation. If you levy a tax on property, you equalize it as far as you are capable of doing under human institutions.

It seems that now even the free-traders and protectionists agree on a wrong principle. My friend from Mississippi is here in accordance with my friend from Vermont on this point. The Senator from Vermont says that if the tax in New York is levied on houses, the tenants pay it. That is not true upon the principles of my friend from Mississippi, nor was it ever held to be true before, to my knowledge, by my friend from Vermont, until this occasion. The doctrine implied by the question put to me by the Senator from Wisconsin, that the duty raises the price of the commodity to the extent of the duty, which doctrine seems to be held by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, is a fallacy, clear, unequivocal, demonstrable, in a hundred instances. I could show them, if necessary, in our own history. It is an element of price, but only an element of price, and there are so many other elements that it may be entirely lost. If it were true, the merchant would be very willing to have you put any duties you pleased on him. Why do foreign countries desire you to throw open your ports for free trade? Are all the world fools but you? England, by her tracts, by her speeches, by her writings, asks you to throw open your ports. Is it on account of the tenderness of England for our people? Do they want the men of Vermont or the men of Georgia to get their fabrics cheaper? They know, for they understand these principles well, that when the duty is levied on imports, it is always levied on them, if they are the importers, and it may forever stand there. It is the same with the houses. If you levy a tax on houses in New York, it is possible that that tax is an element of price, and the tenant may pay it, or he may never pay a dime of it. The cost of building a house is an element of the price of the rent; but who does not know that in half the places in the United States, though the brick and mortar and labor are the true and natural elements of price, you can never get the interest on them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must ask the Senator to pause. The hour has arrived for the special order, which is the unfinished business of yesterday—the loan bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to postpone the special order.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope not.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

Mr. HUNTER. I thought it was understood that we should take up the loan bill at one o'clock. I made no opposition to taking up the other bill in the morning hour.

Mr. SEWARD. I stated to the honorable Senator—perhaps he did not understand me—that he would have an opportunity to make a motion to take up the loan bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if the amendment I offered yesterday is printed?

Mr. HUNTER. Let us take the vote.

Mr. STUART. I suggest to the honorable Senator from New York, for his consideration, whether it would not be better to let us dispose of the loan bill to-day?

Mr. SEWARD. Very well. I am admonished that the honorable Senator from Rhode Island has the floor to-day on that bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the amendment is here which was ordered to be printed last night, we may go on now; but if it is not here, we had better let it go over.

Mr. HUNTER. The amendment is here; it has been returned from the printing office in order that we might go on with the bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw my motion.

FIFTEEN MILLION LOAN.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 396) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000.

Mr. HUNTER. Before the Senator from Rhode Island takes the floor, I ask permission, for a moment or two, to correct an error into which I fell yesterday. In stating the means for this year, I stated the probable receipts from public lands at $7,000,000. I find that I have mistaken the estimate of the Department in that regard, it being less by over two million dollars. I find, however, that I made an underestimate of the receipts from customs and miscellaneous sources, so that, although the whole estimate was somewhat in excess, it is probable, not much in excess of what was received last year.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not find this amendment printed, which the Senator said was printed.

Mr. HUNTER. The amendment is not printed; but if we have to delay our business for the printers, we shall certainly not adjourn by the time fixed, and shall never get through; but the amendment is here. I sent to the printers to return it, in order that we might go on with the bill to-day.

I do not think that it will do to delay the public business for the printers.

Mr. SEWARD. Let the amendment be read. The Secretary read it, as follows:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the sixteenth and seventeenth sections of the act of 30th August, 1842, the eighth section of the act of 30th July, 1846, and the first section of the act of 3d of March, 1853, so far as the same relate to and direct the manner of ascertaining and determining the value of merchandise imported into the United States, at the principal markets of the countries from which the same are imported, shall remain in and continue in force, and in all cases, when the same is practicable, the invoices of all goods, wares, and merchandise at the place or port of exportation shall be verified by the certificate of the consul of the United States at such port; and in no case shall the duties upon goods be levied in any port of the United States upon an amount less than the value stated in such invoices, as required in the proviso to the eighth section of said act of 30th July, 1846, unless the quantity of the articles imported shall be lessened, or the quality injured upon the voyage of importation.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That, in order to prevent the continuance of fraud upon the revenue by the under valuations of foreign imports, and to provide for the valuation of imports in the same currency in which duties are paid, to wit: the legal currency of the United States, it is hereby provided that, in addition to the existing provisions of law for the entry and appraisement, or valuation of any goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United States, it shall be the duty of the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of any goods, wares, or merchandise imported into any port of the United States, to exhibit to the collector or other proper officer of the customs of such port, a true invoice of the goods, wares, and merchandise entered by such person or persons at such port, embracing a statement of the quantity, description, nature, quality, and the true wholesale market price or value of the same, or similar articles in the principal market of the United States, to wit: the city of New York, at the time of such entry or importation, or at the time nearest thereto which is practicable, and such invoice shall be verified and proved by the oath of the said owner, importer, consignee, or agent, who, on conviction of false swearing thereon, shall be subject to the forfeiture and penalties as provided by the laws of the United States in like cases, and prosecuted as for wilful and corrupt perjury; and, upon such wholesale market price or value, to include the foreign cost, all charges, duties, and profits, or so much thereof as may enter into and become a part of such wholesale market price or value, the rates of duty imposed by the existing laws of the United States, at the time of entry of such importation, upon each article enumerated in such invoice, shall be assessed and paid: Provided, That if any collector or other proper officer of the customs shall have doubts as to the correctness of the valuation as above described, or should complain or information be made or given by any person or persons of the incorrectness of any such valuation, it shall be the duty of the collector or other proper officer of the customs to cause the true and actual wholesale market price or value of the same or similar articles in the city of New York, at the time of entry at the port of entry, to be ascertained and appraised in the same mode and manner and appraised in the principal markets of the countries from which the same is imported; and it shall in every case be the duty of the appraisers of the United States, and every of them, and every person who shall act as such appraiser, or of the collector and naval officer, as the case may be, by all reasonable ways and means in his or their power, to ascertain, estimate, and appraise the true actual market value or wholesale price of such goods, wares, and merchandise, in the city of New York, at the time of entry of such goods, wares, and merchandise, at the port of importation, without regard to any other invoice, valuation, or appraisement, or verification of the same by oath or otherwise, or the difference of any such invoice or valuation to the contrary notwithstanding. And if such last mentioned appraisal or valuation shall exceed by ten per centum or more the value so declared on the entry, then, in addition to the duties imposed by law on the same, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of twenty per centum ad valorem on such appraised value, as provided in the eighth section of the act of the 30th July, 1846, entitled "An act reducing the duties on imports, and for other purposes." And the several collectors or other proper officers, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever they shall deem it necessary to secure the proper payment of the revenue due to the United States upon the importation of any goods, wares, or merchandise, may, and they hereby are required, whenever the same is practicable, to take the amount of duties chargeable on any article bearing an ad valorem rate of duty on the article itself, according to the proportion or rate per centum of the duty on said articles; and such goods, so taken, the collector or other proper officer shall cause to be sold, at public auction, within twenty days from the time of taking the same, in the manner prescribed by law, and place the proceeds arising from such sale in the Treasury of the United States. And the said collector or other proper officer of the customs is further authorized and required, when he shall deem it necessary to secure the proper payment of the duties accruing to the Government of the United States, to proceed in the manner prescribed in the eighth section of the said act, approved the 30th day of August, 1842, even though no fraud or intentional undervaluation shall be imputed; and, as compensation to the collector and appraisers for their services in such proceeding, they shall be entitled to a commission of one per centum, to be shared by them, upon the amount of duties thus secured and paid, in addition to such other compensation as they are, by law, entitled to.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That should any person or persons complain or give information to the collector or other proper officer of the customs that any false or under valuation of any goods, wares, or merchandise has been made by any owner, importer, consignee, or agent, as aforesaid, under the preceding section of this act, or of any existing law of the United States, with a view to defraud the Government of the duty legally due upon the same, the proper officer shall proceed to ascertain and appraise the true market value, as provided for in the preceding section and according to law; and if any forfeiture or penalty shall be incurred by any such owner, importer, consignee, or agent, one half the amount or value of such forfeiture shall accrue to the benefit of the person or persons complaining or giving information which may have led to the detection of such fraud or under valuation.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. SIMMONS proceeded to address the Senate on his amendment, and the debate was continued by other Senators to a late hour, when, without taking any question, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 25, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. SEPTIMIUS TUSTIN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MEETING OF THE NEXT CONGRESS.

Mr. GROW asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following joint resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That when the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House adjourn their respective Houses for this session of Congress, it shall be to meet again at twelve o'clock on Thursday, the 4th day of November next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected, and called for the regular order of business.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the ordering the main question upon all the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union yesterday, upon which the previous question was ordered last evening.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think the main question had better be ordered upon each bill separately.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the main question must be ordered upon all the bills together, inasmuch as the previous question was ordered by unanimous consent upon all.

The main question was then ordered to be put upon all the bills.

The following bills, relating to the District of Columbia, reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, were then taken up in their order, and disposed of as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 540) to provide for lighting with gas certain streets across the Mall, reported with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GOODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAMP-POSTS IN GEORGETOWN.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 27) relating to the erection of lamp-posts in Georgetown, District of Columbia, was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. KELSEY demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. GOODE. A provision for the accomplishment of this work has been put in one of the appropriation bills, and I, therefore, move to lay the joint resolution upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ROADS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

A bill (H. R. No. 580) making an appropriation for the repair of certain roads in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GROW moved to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. PEYTON demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion of Mr. Grow was agreed to.

Mr. GROW moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS IN WASHINGTON.

A bill (H. R. No. 248) regulating municipal elections in the city of Washington, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. BURNETT demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 88, nays 91; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Fenton, Gilman, Gilmer, Goode, Goodwin, Grow, Harlan, Hill, Horton, Howard, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Miller, Millson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Parker, Pettit, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Zollicoffer—88.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Blair, Bocock, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Cavanaugh, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Corning, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dean, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hoard, Hopkins, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Letcher, MacLay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Powell, Quitman, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Ward, Watkins, White, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—91.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. WALBRIDGE stated that the health of his colleague, Mr. LEACH, continuing bad, he had left the city, and had paired off for this week with Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina, and for the rest of the session with Mr. GREENWOOD, on all political questions.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina, stated that his colleague, Mr. CRAIG, had been called home by important business, and had paired off for this week with Mr. LEACH.

Mr. MILLSON stated that he voted in the affirmative because of the very harsh and unnecessarily severe penalties contained in the third and fourth sections of the bill.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that he voted in the negative, protesting against the tax-paying qualification.

Mr. ARNOLD not being within the bar when his name was called, asked unanimous consent to vote.

Objection was made.

Mr. RUSSELL made a similar request.

Objection was made.

The question then recurred on striking out the enacting clause; and, being taken, it was decided in the negative.

So the enacting clause was not stricken out.

The question then recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. BURNETT. I move to amend the bill by striking from it that clause which requires the payment of a school tax and tax on personal property.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is operating upon the bill, and the amendment can come in only by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I supposed the previous question only operated upon striking out the enacting clause. The question was stated on striking out the enacting clause, and—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is right.

Mr. BURNETT. I move to amend by striking out, in lines twelve and thirteen, the following words:

—“and shall have paid, and the taxes on personal property due from him.”

I now demand the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. There is another amendment which met the very general approbation of the committee yesterday, and I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will also allow it to come in. It is to add at the end of the section the words, “not exercising or claiming to exercise the right of suffrage elsewhere.”

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir; I do not give way to allow that amendment to be offered. I demand the previous question on the engrossment of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question recurred on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BURNETT demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bocock, Bowie, Boyce, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Cavanaugh, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Corning, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dodd, Dowdell, Elliott, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Gillis, Goodwin, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, Hawkins, Hoard, Hopkins, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Quitman, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, John Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Underwood, Waldron, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Woodson, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—135.

NAYS—Messrs. Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Caslie, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Comins, Cragin, Crawford, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Durfee, Edmundson, Garnett, Gilman, Gilmer, Goode, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Knapp, Morrill, Oliver A. Morse, Pike, Purviance, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, William Smith, Stephens, William Stewart, Thompson, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, White, Wood, and Augustus R. Wright—52.

So the amendment was adopted.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. DAWES stated that his colleague, Mr. DAMRELL, had paired off with Mr. CARUTHERS.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BURNETT demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. DEAN called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Blair, Bocock, Bowie, Boyce, Burnett, Burns, Cavanaugh, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hoard, Hopkins, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Letcher, MacLay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Niblack, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Watkins, Winslow, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham,

Bliss, Branch, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Fenton, Foster, Garnett, Gilman, Gilmer, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hill, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Millson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, William Smith, Stanton, William Stewart, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, Woodson, and Zollicoffer—94.

So the bill was passed.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. WHITELEY stated that he had paired off with Mr. OLIN.

Mr. BURNETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LITTLE FALLS BRIDGE.

A bill (H. R. No. 274) to reimburse the corporation of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, a sum of money advanced towards the construction of the Little Falls bridge, was next taken up for consideration.

Mr. KELSEY moved to lay the bill on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. KELSEY called for tellers on the motion. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KELSEY and WRIGHT of Georgia were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—yeas 74, noes 62.

So the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, called for the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. GOODE asked for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HAWKINS and DURFEE were appointed.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the House hear me give one word of explanation?

Several MEMBERS objected.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—yeas eighty-five; noes not counted.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FIRE DEPARTMENT OF WASHINGTON.

Senate bill (No. 227) authorizing the organization of a fire department in the District of Columbia, reported back by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was not agreed to—only twenty-six having voted therefor.

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. GOODE moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. GOODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL MONUMENT SOCIETY.

An act (No. 152) to incorporate the Washington National Monument Society, reported back from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. MORGAN moved to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE RAILROAD.

House bill (No. 541) in relation to a railway along Pennsylvania avenue, in Washington city, in the District of Columbia, reported back from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Sundry amendments were offered to the bill, by unanimous consent, by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] after the bill was reported to the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit that the motion to strike out the enacting clause cuts off the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The amendments were received by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. But I submit that the amendments could not be entertained with the motion to strike out the enacting clause pending.

The SPEAKER. Not by unanimous consent?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair differs with the gentleman.

The enacting clause to the bill was not stricken out.

Mr. WARD. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The amendments moved by Mr. LETCHER in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and which were cut off by the motion to strike out the enacting clause, but afterwards renewed in the House, were severally read, and agreed to.

Mr. CORNING. I should like to know whether there have been any petitions sent here from the people of this District in favor of this railroad, and whether it is not, in fact, for the benefit of two or three individuals?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WARD. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BISHOP. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (No. 318) for the relief of Keep, Bard, & Co., J. Canfield, and Joseph Landis & Co.; and An act (No. 287) for the relief of Sherlock & Shirley.

OHIO CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The hour has arrived for taking the vote on the Ohio contested-election case.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Let the pending question be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Is it the unanimous consent of the House that the Ohio contested-election case be postponed until the pending bill is disposed of?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I object.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I move, then, that the House proceed to the consideration of the special order fixed for this hour.

Mr. WARD. Yesterday and to-day were set apart for the consideration of business pertaining to the District of Columbia. Has it not, therefore, priority over the special order referred to by the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER. The Ohio contested-election case involves a question of privilege. The Chair is of opinion that where there is a collision between two special orders, the one first made will take precedence; but, in this instance, the special order, appropriating Monday and Tuesday for the consideration of business pertaining to the District of Columbia, was made by a two-thirds vote under the suspension of the rules; whilst the other was made a special order by the unanimous consent of the House, and, of course, will take precedence where they come in collision.

Mr. STANTON. What becomes of the railroad bill?

The SPEAKER. It will come up again so soon as this question is disposed of. The first question in order is on the following proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL:]

"That the papers in the contested-election case of Vallandigham vs. Campbell be, and the same are hereby, recommitted to the Committee of Elections, with instructions that both parties be permitted, by the House, to take further testimony, under the regulations of law, on notice, until the first Monday in December, 1858."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 92, nays 116; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, and Zollicoffer—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, Cavanaugh, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Watkins, White, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—116.

So the proposition was disagreed to.

Pending the above call,

Mr. POTTLE stated that Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts, was detained from the Hall by indisposition.

Mr. TRIPPE stated that his colleague, Mr. HILL, had paired off on this question with Mr. McKIBBIN.

Mr. MAYNARD stated that he had paired off on this question with his colleague, Mr. SAYAGE.

Mr. TRIPPE stated that on this question he had paired off with Mr. REAGAN.

Mr. COCKERILL stated that his colleague, Mr. PENDLETON, had paired off with Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland.

The result having been announced as above recorded,

The question next recurred on the following resolution, offered by Mr. GILMER:

Resolved, That the Hon. Lewis D. Campbell is entitled to retain his seat as member from the third congressional district in the State of Ohio to this Congress.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 92, nays 116; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, and Wood—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, Cavanaugh, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Letcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Peyton, John S.

Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Watkins, White, Winslow, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—116.

So the resolution was disagreed to.

Pending the above call,

Mr. CHAFFEE stated that he was out attending to business of his committee when his name was called, and asked leave to vote.

Mr. PHILLIPS objected.

Mr. CHAFFEE said that, if allowed to vote, he would have voted in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question next recurred on the following resolutions, offered by Mr. LAMAR:

Resolved, That Lewis D. Campbell is not entitled to a seat in the Thirty-Fifth Congress as the Representative from the third congressional district of Ohio.

Resolved, That Clement L. Vallandigham is entitled to a seat in the Thirty-Fifth Congress as the Representative from the third congressional district of Ohio.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORGAN. Is that proposition divisible?

The SPEAKER. It is all offered as one amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Which resolution do we vote on now?

The SPEAKER. The House votes on the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. HILL. Is it in order to move that the further consideration of this question be postponed?

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order, as the House is now acting under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that the original resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] to which that is an amendment, be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a vacancy exists in the representation in the House of Representatives of the United States from the third congressional district of the State of Ohio, and that the Speaker be directed to notify the Governor of that State thereof.

Mr. LETCHER. To simplify the thing, as the vote has substantially been taken on the first branch of the amendment, I suggest that now the vote be taken on the other branch.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the resolution is not divisible.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object.

Mr. HILL. If the amendment be voted down, will not the question then recur on the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS?]

The SPEAKER. It will. The amendment is to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and to insert what has been read. If the amendment be agreed to, then the question will recur on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Inasmuch as the House has already voted on the first branch of the amendment, I suggest that the vote now be on the second branch of it.

The SPEAKER. Unless by unanimous consent, the Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is not divisible. If a division had been asked for before the call for the previous question, it would have been in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I think that the Chair's decision is correct. I ask that it be done by unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS objected.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, Cavanaugh, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Miller, Moore, Niblack, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Scales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, White, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—109.

YAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buflinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Milson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Riccaud, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Wilson, Wood, and Zollcoffer—103.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Pending the vote,

Mr. WHITELEY stated that he had paired off with Mr. OLIN.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, said: I will change my vote, and vote in the affirmative, for the purpose of moving to reconsider. I do not do it with the purpose of delaying the vote. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The result was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. LAMAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I move that the House do now adjourn; and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays. I do it for the purpose—

[Cries of "Order!"]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of the roll, but was interrupted by—

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, who said: I desire to withdraw the motion to adjourn. I will state that I did not know that one or two gentlemen who are absent had paired off. Since I made the motion, I have been informed that the gentlemen to whom I refer are paired. With the leave of the House, and with the privilege of changing my vote back to where it was, I will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. EUSTIS objected.

The Clerk resumed the call of the roll; but was subsequently interrupted by—

Mr. EUSTIS, who withdrew his objection.

Mr. REILLY renewed the objection.

The call of the roll was then concluded; and the result was announced—yeas 12, nays 190; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bennett, Billingshurst, Burroughs, Case, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Durfee, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, and Wood—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Cavanaugh, Chapman, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Buflinton, Burlingame, Burdett, Burns, Caskie, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Wilson, Winslow, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—190.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Pending the call,

Mr. TRIPPE stated that he had paired off with

Mr. REAGAN upon all contested-election cases, and supposed the pair extended to all incidental questions; and therefore he would not vote.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, stated that he had paired off with Mr. PENDLETON upon the contested-election case of Vallandigham vs. Campbell.

The question recurring upon the motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted,

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 99; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Cavanaugh, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Wright—108.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buflinton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Grow, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Milson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward J. Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Purviance, Ready, Riccaud, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, and Zollcoffer—99.

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The question recurring upon the original proposition as amended,

Mr. LEITER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 100; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Cavanaugh, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gooch, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, MacLay, McKibbin, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Miller, Moore, Niblack, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quinman, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Watkins, White, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buflinton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Lovejoy, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Milson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ready, Riccaud, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wilson, Wood, and Zollcoffer—100.

So the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. LAMAR moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay upon the table was agreed to.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM was then qualified by taking the usual oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

RAILWAY ON PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

The SPEAKER stated that the business next in order was the demand for the previous question on the bill (H. R. No. 541) in relation to a railway through Pennsylvania avenue, in the District of Columbia.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. BISHOP moved to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. COX demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 87, nays 100; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bonham, Bowie, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Cavanaugh, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Mississippi, Dean, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Harlan, Hatch, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Lawrence, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, McQueen, Mason, Maynard, Miller, Milson, Morgan, Isaac N. Morris, Murray, Niblack, Pettit, Peyton, John S. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Underwood, Vallandigham, Elihu B. Washburne, Watkins, White, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Buflinton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hawkins, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Matteson, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Palmer, Parker, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Quinman, Ready, Riccaud, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Israel Washburn, and Augustus R. Wright—100.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

Pending the vote,

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, stated that Mr. SANDIDGE had paired off with Mr. GILMAN.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, demanded the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Buflinton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Farnsworth, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Groesbeck, Grow, Thomas L. Sherman, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Israel Washburn, Wood, and Augustus R. Wright—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Bishop, Bonham, Bowie, Burns, Caskie, Cavanaugh, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Mississippi, Dean, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, McQueen, Mason, Miller, Milson, Morgan, Isaac N. Morris, Murray, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, John S. Phelps, Powell, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Seales, Scott, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Underwood, Vallandigham, Elihu B. Washburne, Watkins, White, Winslow, Woodson, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—82.

So the bill was passed.

Pending the vote,

Mr. MAYNARD stated that he had paired off on this question.

Mr. BARKSDALE stated that he had been in when his name was called he would have voted in the negative.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT TURNPIKE ROADS.

Mr. GOODE. I yesterday made an adverse report on a petition in reference to the purchase of certain turnpike gates and roads, and gave the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BOWIE] the opportunity to make a minority report, accompanied by a bill. I ask that the majority report, and the views of the minority together with the accompanying bill, be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed. It was so ordered.

FURNITURE OF OLD HALL.

Mr. GOODE. I have to ask the House, perhaps as the last favor during the session, to adopt a resolution which I have been instructed to report by the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, directed to place at the disposal of the trustees of the public schools of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, for the use of the public schools in their respective cities, the chairs and desks lately used by members in the old Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is that resolution in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order. It is a report from the committee.

Mr. GOODE. If this resolution be adopted, it is obvious that the remnant of old furniture will be appropriated to a useful purpose. If it be not thus appropriated, it will be sent to the auctioneer and sold for a trifle. Now, I ask the members of this House, if they can do better than to send this old furniture to be enjoyed by the rising generation—for the benefit of the high purpose of education? I am sure that I have said sufficient to induce the House to adopt the resolution; and if the simple suggestion is not enough, I could not say enough. "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of Heaven." I ask the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. SEWARD. Is that a resolution of the House or a joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. A resolution of the House.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, this is properly belonging to the Government, and we cannot dispose of it by a simple resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Would it be in order to move to substitute the desks and chairs in this Hall for those in the old Hall? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order now.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If it would, I would cheerfully do that. I would rather give them these desks and chairs than those in the old Hall.

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURN's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

PROVIDENT ASSOCIATION OF CLERKS.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House laid upon the table Senate bill (No. 151) further to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Provident Association of Clerks in the civil department of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Does this business come in under the special order?

The SPEAKER. The bill was reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia. On motion of the chairman of the committee, it was laid upon the table on the 28th of April last. A motion was then made to reconsider, and the question now is upon that motion.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would like the House to consider the bill. The committee reported adversely on it, and it was laid upon the table without discussion or consideration.

Mr. SCALES. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would be very glad to know what we are voting about. I should be happy to have the bill reported. I do not know whether it ought to be laid upon the table or not.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The bill is very short, and I hope it will be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill was reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia, with a recommendation that it be laid upon the table; and it was accordingly laid upon the table. This is a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was laid on the table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will not ask for the reading of the bill under those circumstances.

The motion to reconsider was laid upon the table—ayes one hundred; noes not counted.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GROW. I desire to ask my colleague if he proposes to close the debate on the fortification bill? We might pass it this evening.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I propose to take up another bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to introduce a joint resolution.

Mr. WINSLOW. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to have an order made for the printing of a bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have a joint resolution which I desire the House to pass.

Mr. WINSLOW. I thought the floor was assigned to me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair assigned the floor to the gentleman from Alabama, in case the gentleman from Pennsylvania would yield it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

PAYMENT OF WITNESSES.

Mr. HOUSTON. There are various witnesses who have been discharged from select committees and have not been paid. The Clerk has estimated that $12,000 is the amount necessary to pay them. I ask the House to pass the joint resolution, so that the witnesses who have been discharged may be paid, and permitted to return home.

No objection being made, Mr. Houston introduced a joint resolution making appropriation to pay the expenses of the several investigating committees of the House of Representatives; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOUSTON. As it is important that the joint resolution should pass speedily, I ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The joint resolution was then passed.

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I want to know whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to have a business session or a session for debate?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I propose to have a business one, and I hope gentlemen will stay here and keep a quorum here.

[Cries of "Agreed!"]

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES; and it was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois,) in the chair.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated the first business in order to be the consideration of the fortification bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. As the bill making appropriations for fortifications has been taken up heretofore for the purposes of general debate, and as there is likely to be considerable debate on the bill upon its merits, I propose to lay it aside, and take up the Senate amendments to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. STANTON. I wish to know of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, whether it is his intention not to have the fortification bill taken up again during the present session?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It is my intention to have it taken up as soon as the committee have disposed of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I move to lay the bill aside, and to take up House bill No. 201 with the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rose while the Chair was putting the question, for the purpose of giving notice, in behalf of the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. WHITELEY,] that he intended to offer an amendment to this bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will say to my colleague that I propose to take up the fortification bill as soon as the other bill is disposed of.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The bill of the House (No. 201) making appropriation for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, with the Senate amendments thereto, was taken up for consideration.

First amendment:

Add at the end of the clause "For compensation and mileage of Senators, $162,750," as follows:

And a sufficient sum, in addition thereto, to pay the mileage of the newly elected members of the Senate in attendance at the called executive session, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1857; but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to allow constructive mileage.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in that amendment. The compensation law provided that the compensation of Senators should be $6,000 for each Congress, and that they should be allowed mileage for two sessions. This is to provide mileage for the new Senators who may have come in the short executive session usually held at the close of the short session. The committee did not see why the law should be changed in this respect, and therefore recommend a non-concurrence in the amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Second amendment:

Strike out, in lines twenty six, twenty-seven, and twenty-eight, as follows: "One at $1,080, and one at $750," and insert "at $1,080 each," so that the clause will read: Two messengers at $1,080 each.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment. It is merely for an increase in the salary of a messenger. I hope the House will concur in the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

In line fifty-two, strike out "$584," and insert "$914."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This is only to carry out in the gross amount the change made by the last amendment. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

Add, at the end of line fifty-three, the following: For the additional compensation allowed by the resolution of the Senate of the 11th of May, 1858, to a messenger in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, $330.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a disagreement to this amendment, chiefly upon the ground that whatever may have been the necessity for the service, it is a deficiency, and not proper to be provided for in this bill.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

Add at the end of line seventy-four the following: For stationery for fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1858, $5,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This amendment, and the following, the Committee of Ways and Means non-concur in, principally on the ground that they are deficiencies.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Sixth amendment:

Add after the end of the above amendment the following: For miscellaneous items for fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1858, $3,000.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Seventh amendment:

Strike out "seventy" and insert "sixty" in the appropriation for binding the Congressional Globe, so that the clause shall read as follows:

Provided, That no greater price shall be paid for the same than sixty cents for each volume or part actually bound and delivered.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in the amendment of the Senate, with an amendment, adding the word "three" to the word "sixty." The Senate made the sum sixty cents, under a misapprehension of the facts. It was discovered afterwards that the sum should have been sixty-three cents; and the Committee of Ways and Means recommend that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in, with the amendment I have indicated.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to inquire whether this is not the same matter on which we had a discussion in this House when the bill was under consideration before, in regard to changing the contract made by the Clerk for binding the Globe? If so, I hope the House will not concur in it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The proposition before the House was to limit the sum to sixty-three cents, designating, at the same time, who should do the binding. This amendment only limits the maximum to sixty-three cents.

Mr. SEWARD. I understand that, under existing laws, the Clerk of the House had contracted for this binding prior to the adoption of the Senate amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I understand that to be so; but this amendment does not interfere with that contract.

Mr. SEWARD. I want to have the contracts of the Clerk of this House carried out.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I understand there is no price specified in that contract, and the price now proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means is the price which is paid for the Senate binding of this work.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Has not the Government fixed the price at seventy cents?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. My own opinion of the contract is, and I have read it carefully, that it does not cover the Congressional Globe and Appendix; and that if it does cover it, it does not fix the price at sixty or seventy cents.

Mr. SEWARD. I understand how this thing works. Mr. Rives, who publishes the Globe, and is making large profits by it, undertakes to underbid and reduce the price below what it has been done for. I am opposed to it. I think the House sustained the position of the Clerk under the existing law, by a majority of sixty. The law, as it now exists, requires that the Clerk should carry out that contract.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] is right about this binding not being included in the contract made by the Clerk. The Committee of Accounts have the right to fix the price for it. I will tell the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Seward] that that committee have an offer for this binding at fifty cents, and the probability is, that it will be fixed at that price. And it is not Mr. Rives who makes the proposition; but another gentleman, who is a responsible book-binder. He has made the offer by letter to the Committee of Accounts, to do it for fifty cents instead of for sixty-three or seventy cents. For that reason I think this ought to be stricken out.

Mr. SEWARD. At what time was that proposition made—before or subsequent to the contract made by the Clerk?

Mr. MASON. It was subsequent.

Mr. SEWARD. That is what I suppose.

Mr. MASON. It was uncertain whether the Clerk had let it out. If he had let it out it was under that provision which gave the Committee of Accounts power to fix the price. It is proposed, as I have said, to do this work for fifty cents, and I hope that this provision for sixty-three cents will be stricken out.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I concur in the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, in so far as the offer is concerned and the price for which this binding can be had. I am satisfied, from an investigation that the special committee have made, that it can be done for even less than that. I think that if the Clerk were to advertise, a number of parties in this city would offer to do the work for forty cents per volume, and then they would make a handsome profit out of it. I think that forty cents is quite sufficient.

The question was taken on the amendment to the Senate amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question was then taken on the Senate amendment; and the Chair announced that the yeas had it, and that the amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I call for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The call for a division, in the opinion of the Chair, comes too late.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I called for a division in time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair neither saw nor heard the gentleman.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I rose as soon as it was possible to ask for a division; and I insist on my right to have it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question has been decided.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. There is some confusion here. How does the question now stand; at sixty or seventy cents?

The CHAIRMAN. At seventy.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. So I understand.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understood that we had agreed to the amendment of the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means was not agreed to, and the question then recurred on the amendment of the Senate. The question was taken, and the amendment was non-concurred in. After the Chair made that announcement, the gentleman from New York rose and called for a division.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I understand the Chair to decide that the call for a division came too late. I call for the reading of the next amendment, and ask that we proceed with this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. LETCHER. We can arrange this matter by agreeing to an amendment, so that this matter may be understood. It seems to me that, if the House understood it, there would not be two opinions about it. The whole point is this: whether the House will concur with the Senate in limiting the appropriation for a specified object to a certain sum. That is the whole of it. As it now stands, there is no specific sum; and the amendment I would suggest does not affect the rights of anybody.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to debate unless I can be heard in reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. NICHOLS. I wish to make a suggestion to my colleague on the special Committee on Printing, that, if he desires to have a vote on this amendment, he can have it in the House. This question has been decided; and, for one, I desire to see business progress.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I have no desire to delay the business of the House. I am as desirous as any gentleman to progress with the business; but I do not believe that it is the feeling of the committee to non-concur in the Senate amendment, and go back to the price of seventy cents. I am willing, however, to withdraw the appeal, with the understanding that we shall have a vote in the House.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask that the next three amendments be read together.

The Clerk read the following amendments:

Eighth amendment:

To pay to the reporters of the Senate the usual extra compensation for the third session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, $300 each—$3,300.

Ninth amendment:

To pay to the reporters of the Senate the usual extra compensation for the first session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, $600 each—$3,200.

Tenth amendment:

To pay to the reporters of the Senate the usual extra compensation for the second session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, $600 each—$3,200.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in these three amendments. These amendments provide for the extra compensation of the reporters of the Senate. It is proper that I should state that in the deficiency bill, and in this bill, the House have provided for their reporters. The Committee of Ways and Means, however, have instructed me to report a non-concurrence in these amendments.

Mr. FLORENCE. Do I understand the gentleman that a distinction is to be made between the reporters of the Senate and those of the House? If the House reporters get the extra compensation, the others should. For my life, I cannot see why you should make flesh of one and fish of the other.

Mr. QUITMAN. I should be glad to know exactly the conclusion to which the Committee of Ways and Means came on the Senate amendments.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means directed me to report a disagreement to these three amendments. The appropriations are similar in character, and are for three different sessions of Congress. Payment for congressional reporting has been provided for by usage and custom, not by law, by adding $800 to each reporter of this House in appropriation bills. There was a contest over it on the deficiency bill, but the appropriation was made by a large majority. That was for the present session. It has been paid in preceding sessions, and in this bill we have provided for them for the next session. When the bill went to the Senate, that body decided, that inasmuch as we had made the appropriations for our reporters, they would provide for their reporters in the same manner. Hence these three amendments.

Mr. KELSEY. Upon what grounds do the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in these amendments? Is it because a part of this matter was a deficiency?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The first one is for a deficiency.

Mr. KELSEY. I think that inasmuch as we have to pay this money at some time, we might as well pay it in this bill as in any other. It is manifest that Congress will not consent to pay to the reporters of this House more money than to the reporters of the Senate. Let us dispose of this matter here, and that will be the end of it.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. When these amendments were under consideration in the Committee of Ways and Means, I was not present. I have advocated paying to the reporters of this House the usual extra compensation. We have paid it to them for the last six years. The Senate have paid to their reporters the same sum for the same period of time, except for this and the last session. I am of opinion that the reporters of the Senate should be treated in the same manner as we treat the reporters of this House. The Senate have placed these amendments on the bill. That body is better able to determine where they will increase the salaries of their employes. I am therefore in favor of concurring in the Senate amendments.

The question being upon concurring with the Senate in the first of the three amendments, Mr. FLORENCE asked for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs GARTRELL and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 40.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The ninth and tenth amendments of the Senate were then concurred in.

Eleventh amendment:

In lines one hundred and seventy-two and one hundred and seventy-three, strike out the words "draughtsmen and clerks employed upon the land maps."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means propose to disagree to the amendment of the Senate. It proposes to strike out the provision for the five clerks employed on maps for the Committee on Public Lands provided for by the House, and the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

Mr. McQUEEN. I hope the committee will concur in the amendment of the Senate. The Committee on Public Lands had occasion to examine into this subject pretty thoroughly, and if any good results to this Government from the employment of these map clerks, I am sure I have been unable to discover it. This matter has already cost the Government a large amount of money. This provision is for clerks who are employed in staining maps for the Committee on Public Lands. Four maps have been already prepared, and, as I said upon a former occasion,

I do not believe there is any gentleman here who would give fifty dollars for the four, if they were offered him at that price, for any use they can be applied to on the face of the earth. At one time there were nine regular clerks, employed at salaries of $1,800, and a draughtsman at a salary of two thousand one hundred or two thousand two hundred dollars a year. In addition to that there were eight supernumerary clerks employed temporarily, for what purpose I cannot tell. Since 1848 they have had from four to eighteen or nineteen clerks employed on this work at these salaries.

I have been upon the Committee on Public Lands during this Congress, and have endeavored to discharge my duty pretty closely. I never was on the committee before; and if one single particle of benefit has been derived from these maps, I have not discovered it. I think I am within the bounds of truth and reason when I say that they have already cost the Government $60,000 or $75,000, or perhaps $100,000. A friend near me suggests $200,000; and if a particle of benefit has resulted from that expenditure, I cannot discover it. It may be recollected that the Committee on Public Lands reported in favor of employing five clerks. This amendment is to strike out the provision for the salaries of those clerks, and I hope it will be concurred in.

I know it is urged that these maps are of utility to the Committee on Public Lands, because when grants are asked for railroads, they can refer to the maps and see what lands may be obtained under those grants. We have had numerous propositions before us, this whole session, for grants to railroads, and if any light has been thrown upon the subject by these maps, I am sure I have been unable to discover it. It is well known, as I said on a former occasion, that when men come here to obtain grants of lands for railroads, they come with their plans arranged to construct the railroads from point to point in the State or Territory, generally from town to town; and it is perfectly immaterial to them whether the lands through which the roads pass have been appropriated heretofore or not, or where they get the lands. They usually take them in alternate sections within six miles of the road, or go outside for fifteen miles. The Committee on Public Lands have now before them bills granting lands to railroads, but I have not seen a single instance in which the committee have derived any benefit from these maps.

These clerkships, it is true, are good sinecures, and afford employment to gentlemen who are lurking about this Capitol on salaries of $1,800 a year. But with all respect for gentlemen who differ with me, I am unable to see that the Government derives any benefit. I have heard gentlemen here say, upon former occasions, that they have a contempt for this small system of economy, and that the men who come here to work ought to be paid by the Government. I have much more contempt for that system which has grown up here by which men are brought from the honest pursuits of life in the country to this city, to loaf, and ferret out and scent out and pursue petty offices, until they are taught to believe that it is well for them to leave their honest pursuits and come to this city to live upon the public pay of the Government. I have much more contempt for that, and I hold that it is much more injurious to the people of this country. And I will add further, that the largest bodies are composed of smaller particles. We must cut off small expenditures to restrict the larger. When this thing commenced, there were but four clerks. We now have eight, as I understand. We began with less than eight thousand dollars. The expense has since run up to twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars a year.

But, sir, I will not detain the committee. I stated my reasons why I wished to do away with this system when the matter was before the committee on a former occasion. I earnestly hope the committee and the House will concur in the amendment of the Senate. No good can be derived from the work. A large public expense is incurred by it. Men are brought here and put in office; and I am informed that some of these clerks who have been appointed to office have not done a thing, although they have drawn their pay.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to ask the gentleman for leave to interrupt him for a minute or two, for I do not wish to take the floor to speak on this amendment after he has yielded the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot take the floor from the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. McQUEEN. I am willing to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am sorry the gentleman from Kentucky does not know that one gentleman on the floor may yield it to another. It is certainly competent for me to occupy the floor to make an explanation, with the consent of the gentleman from South Carolina, who holds the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It is precisely to that point of order that I propose to speak. I attempted the same thing yesterday, and was called to order by my colleague. Now, I insist that the gentleman has no right to speak in the time of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I suppose the Chair will decide. I insist that I have the right to occupy the time of the gentleman, with his consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that the gentleman from South Carolina may, under the practice of the committee, yield the floor for the purpose of asking a question, or making explanation.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. That is directly against the ruling of the Speaker, yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling of the Speaker in the House does not apply to the committee.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The estimate made by the Clerk of the House was for nine clerks, and the Committee of Ways and Means reported that sum in the bill. But when the bill came up in the House, upon the statement of the majority of the Committee on Public Lands that only five clerks were necessary, the House, after full discussion, agreed, by a considerable majority, to cut down the number to five. There was perhaps a little feeling in reference to the action of the Senate. The Senate put in its own amendments for its own officers, giving its reporters extra compensation for three sessions, while they have stricken out provisions put in by the House which related to the officers of the House. But I will say, in response to the gentleman from South Carolina, who desired to know upon what basis the Committee of Ways and Means had acted in recommending a non-concurrence to the Senate amendment, that when this matter was before the House before, after a full discussion, upon the recommendation of the Committee on Public Lands, it was decided that five clerks were necessary, and the Committee of Ways and Means thought proper to recommend a continuance of that number.

Mr. McQUEEN. I was going on to say that this resolution, when it was originally presented, was a sort of a mongrel affair. A simple resolution of the House was passed in 1848, requiring the Clerk of the House to furnish maps of the public lands, under the supervision or direction of the Commissioner of Public Lands. That was the commencement of the system. But during the present session the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands has addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and they both concur in the opinion that the service of these clerks is no longer needed. Now, sir, these clerks are not under the control of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in whose office they must have access to the records. The Clerk of the House cannot have control of their business, because he has no authority over the land records in the Land Office; and it is impossible that this service can be as well performed, if it is performed at all, as if the clerks were under the control of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. And again, the regulations of the General Land Office require the land records to be kept secret, to prevent speculations in the public lands. These clerks are not subject to those regulations; and it is very easy to see how they may be of very great benefit to speculators; but they are of no benefit to the House. I hope the amendment of the Senate will not be stricken out. It is due, in justice to the present Clerk of the House, that I should say I have heard no grounds of complaint against him for anything connected with his duty in this matter.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not propose to detain the committee by any discussion of this amendment. Gentlemen will remember that the matter was thoroughly discussed when the bill was originally before the committee. I am in favor of the recommendation of the Committee on Public Lands; and I hope the vote will be taken.

Mr. LETCHER. I am decidedly in favor of concurring in the amendment of the Senate; and I desire to make an inquiry of my friend from South Carolina, who is a member of the Committee on Public Lands. I understand that committee have been now for some months in the room assigned to them in the new wing of the Capitol. Now, I wish to inquire whether these maps have ever been transferred there from the old committee-room?

Mr. McQUEEN. I intended to have referred to that fact myself. It may be that some members of the committee have had occasion to refer to them since the organization of Congress. But we have now been some time in the new committee-room, and they have not been removed, although we have had some important land grants under consideration in that time.

Mr. LETCHER. Now, it seems to me that that statement of itself is enough to show that the value of these clerks has been greatly exaggerated, to say the least of it. This very fact shows that the Committee on Public Lands have no use for these clerks at all, and it seems to me that every consideration of economy and propriety, as well as the desire to prevent the concentration of patronage here in this city, requires that we should put a stop to this thing as far as possible. Now, sir, this whole thing is an anomaly. It is a most extraordinary state of things, when you have the records of the Land Office committed to the care of the Land Office, under regulations prescribed by that office, that all these records must be intrusted to these clerks to make up the maps as they please. If this thing is to be continued, it ought to be under the control of the Land Office. There should be harmony in these matters.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. LETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If the gentleman cannot answer my question, probably the gentleman from South Carolina can. If we discharge the clerks now employed under the auspices of this House, will we be compelled to give extra clerks to the Interior Department to discharge the same duties?

Mr. LETCHER. I understand not; for I learn from the letter of the Secretary of the Interior that this is of no account, and that he does not want anything to do with it. That is my understanding of the communication from the Interior Department. The gentleman from South Carolina will say whether I am right about it or not?

Mr. McQUEEN. That is my impression. Heretofore, and even now, perhaps, when land grants were proposed, the Commissioner of the General Land Office is addressed on the subject, and requested to furnish the House with maps and plats, so that it may be seen what lands are granted and what reserved to the Government. That has been done, and may be done again.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina, my colleague on the Committee on Public Lands, whether he has ever known any instance where the Commissioner of the Land Office was able to furnish that kind of information, except through these very clerks?

Mr. McQUEEN. I have not been on the Committee on Public Lands until this year. In the course of the investigation of this matter, I understood that heretofore the Land Office had always supplied the Committee on Public Lands and this House, when it was desired, with maps showing the sections, ranges, townships, and quarter sections. I have no doubt that without these clerks there might be a short delay; but I have as little doubt that when wanted, the information can be furnished in ample time.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I undertake to say, in answer to the remark of the gentleman from South Carolina, that the Commissioner of the General Land Office, without the aid of these clerks, has it not within his power to furnish this kind of information in any one State in less than four months, even if he devoted the whole force of his office to it.

Mr. LETCHER. As I understand it at present, the committee are considering questions in connection with public lands in Kansas and Nebraska, which these map clerks have never reached as yet. If the Committee on Public Lands, with the gentleman from Michigan, can consider these questions in an enlightened way at present, when there is not a map to indicate the land which has been sold or reserved, why, then, is there a necessity for keeping up these clerks, and entailing expense upon the country?

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I will answer the gentleman right here. We are now acting in the Committee on Public Lands in reference to land grants in Kansas and Nebraska. We are utterly in the dark. We have no means of knowing anything about the quantity of land which will be taken under the proposed grants. And here I wish to say that the resolution of 1848, under which these clerks were appointed, confines their action to the States in which there are public lands. They are not authorized to make these maps for the Territories; and before this session terminates, I propose to offer a resolution to extend that work to the Territories, as well as the States.

Mr. LETCHER. As I understand it, they have had nine clerks for a long series of years; and if these clerks have not made headway enough to keep up with the progressive spirit of legislation in granting lands for railroad purposes, why does not the gentleman propose to wait until they do get up with them?

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I have said that they were not authorized to make maps for the Territories. They have made and finished their maps of the States up to this time.

Mr. LETCHER. If they were not authorized to make maps for the Territories, I take it that, if the gentleman cannot legislate in an intelligent way without these maps, he is not doing justice to himself or to the House when he is undertaking to legislate on the public lands in Kansas and Nebraska.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. The question of whether I am doing justice to the country or to this House, in my action on the Committee on Public Lands, with the lights I have, is not to be answered here, and it does not come into this controversy. It has nothing to do with this controversy.

Mr. LETCHER. When the gentleman undertakes to lay down a proposition, I have the right to use that proposition in the way of argument, and show that the conclusion at which he arrives is not warranted by the facts in the case. That is all I have to do. The gentleman started out with the proposition that without these clerks they could not get along intelligently in the Committee on Public Lands. I ask him, then, how they are getting along now, when these clerks have not reached that point where their information can be used?

Then, the gentleman says that his course is not a subject of criticism. I am not subjecting his course to criticism, but I am taking his own position, for the purpose of showing that that very argument upon which he relies proves clearly and conclusively that these clerks are of precious little use.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. The gentleman persists in misunderstanding or misrepresenting me. I say that the labor of these clerks has been of important service to the Committee on Public Lands. The maps upon which they have bestowed their labor are of service to me daily, and whether the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McQUEEN] derives advantage from them or not, is not for me to say. We are called to act on land questions every day, and frequently, without these maps, we are compelled to act entirely in the dark, so far as knowing the quantity of land we are granting. In no instance have we the means of knowing the amount of land the Government holds, through which roads are proposed to be run, without these maps.

Mr. LETCHER. As I understand that matter, so far as these railroad grants are concerned in the States, they undertook to equalize them in the last Congress, and to designate the quantity of land that was to be appropriated for railroad purposes; and if there has been an equality produced in this way, it seems to me that these land clerks cannot be of the least service, unless it is intended to give the remainder of the land besides. If that is to be done, it appears to me that it should be done with as little expense as possible. I hope the Senate amendment will be concurred in.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the Senate, and I thought that, after the discussion we had on the subject in committee, the deliberate opinion of this House was expressed on this question on the bill as it passed this House.

It will be recollected that upon the report of the Committee on Public Lands, the number of clerks to be employed upon these land maps was reduced from nine, to one draughtsman and four clerks. I have, myself, in examinations concerning land matters in the State of Missouri, derived great benefit from a consultation of the maps which were being prepared for that State. I know that not long since important information was derived from draughtsmen having in charge these maps, in relation to the question of the discontinuance of some land offices in the State of Missouri; and that information caused a change in the action of the land department.

Mr. McQUEEN. I would ask the gentleman if the same information could not have been obtained at the public land office?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I will state this fact in reply to the gentleman; that information was obtained from the General Land Office, and upon that information it was thought proper that certain land offices in the State of Missouri should be discontinued, because it was supposed that the amount of public land undisposed of in that district was below the limit fixed by law. But upon subsequent information obtained from Mr. Parker, who is the draughtsman having the maps in charge, and also from suggestions from the local land offices, the Commissioner of the General Land Office was satisfied that a mistake had been made, and therefore he recommended a continuance of the land offices I have referred to. The same information could have been obtained from the General Land Office, but would have required more time to obtain it.

I am, therefore, opposed to the adoption of the amendment of the Senate, and in favor of the continuance of these land-map clerks for at least one year longer.

I desire to see the maps perfected which are now nearly completed. We know that the very large entry of lands, by cash and land warrants for a few years past, must have rendered it very difficult for these clerks to keep up the land maps without the employment of additional force by the Clerk of this House to bring those maps up to the present state of the land business.

Mr. COBB. The Clerk of this House has not employed any additional clerks.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I referred to the predecessor of the present Clerk.

The question recurring on concurring in the Senate amendment,

Mr. RUFFIN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLEMENS, and WRIGHT of Georgia, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 39, noes 79.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MASON. I move to amend this section, in reference to these land-map clerks, by adding to it the following proviso:

Provided, That the clerks shall not be compelled to remain in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the motion which the gentleman made to amend, by adding at the end of the section, would not be in order.

Thirteenth amendment:

Insert the following:

For procuring manure, tools, fuel, repairs, purchasing trees and shrubs for botanic garden, to be expended under the direction of the Library Committee of Congress, $2,300.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in that amendment.

Mr. GARNETT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question at this point. Here are three amendments in reference to the green-houses. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend that the first and second amendments be non-concurred in, and that the third amendment, which provides for reglazing the green-houses, be agreed to. Now, if the first two amendments are rejected, there will be nothing with which to pay the salaries of the horticulturist and his assistants, or to procure manure or tools and fuel to keep the plants alive. I desire to know what is the use of glazing the green-houses if you do not provide means to keep the plants alive and have them taken care of? For myself, I have shown by my votes here that I am as much opposed to unnecessary expenditures as any member of the House; but I think these green-houses a fair and legitimate portion of the ornaments of our Capitol grounds, and in much better taste than many ornaments which we have voted money to pay for. I think that if we reglaze the green-houses we ought to vote something to pay the persons who attend to them, and to keep the plants alive. I, therefore, hope the House will concur in these amendments of the Senate.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The reason why the committee recommended a concurrence in the third of these amendments is, that the glass in these green-houses was destroyed by the great hail-storm last summer.

Mr. PETTIT. I have but a word to say upon this subject, and shall not detain the committee long. It was by an omission on the part of the Committee on the Library, the estimate not being then complete, that these provisions were not inserted in the bill when it was pending in the House. I had supposed that it was the purpose of the Committee of Ways and Means to make provisions for all those expenditures that are regularly prescribed by law. My impression has been, both from the steady course of legislation upon this subject, and from the manner in which the estimates have been made, that there could be no doubt that these provisions come within that rule.

To show that these subjects are provided for by law, with deference to the opinion of that committee, I refer to the following clause of the appropriation act of June 17, 1844, for civil and diplomatic expenses:

"To defray the expenses of taking care of and preserving the botanical and horticultural specimens brought home by the exploring expedition, and for the salary of the keeper of, and enlarging, the green-house, under the direction and control of the Joint Committee on the Library, $2,200."

This clause not only makes an appropriation, but is original and permanent legislation; for it makes an officer, prescribes his duties, and subjects him to control; and subsequent appropriations, and the estimates of the present year, have been made accordingly.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I may, perhaps, save time by saying to my friend from Indiana that no issue is made about the legality of these provisions. The committee did not report against them on that ground.

Mr. PETTIT. With this understanding, then, I have nothing further to say, and hope the amendment of the Senate will be concurred in.

Mr. SEWARD. I am opposed to the amendment unless some gentleman can show me that it has something or other to do with one of the departments of the Government provided for in this bill. I am not aware that the legislative department of the Government has to be manured, [laughter,] or the executive or the judicial department, or that they want tools. These botanic gardens might be made useful; but they are now a sort of pet concern in the hands of the flower-pot committee of the Senate. [Laughter.] I think the flowers must be sold to those men who sell bouquets about the city. I know I never can get a solitary flower there. I am told I must get an order from a Senator. The whole thing is got up here for the purpose of giving out flowers to particular favorites; and I do not want to have to go to any Senator or anybody else for an order when I want a flower. I hope the amendment will be disagreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire merely to notice a passing remark made by the gentleman from Georgia. I think he does the superintendent of the green-houses great injustice when he supposes for a moment that he has sold bouquets to the bouquet vendors of the city of Washington. I am acquainted with that individual; I have frequently met him, and had pleasant and agreeable associations with him; and I should do injustice to my own feelings if I were to hear an imputation of that sort made against him, without saying that I know him, and believe him to be as honest a man, and as much of a gentleman as any one, and that he would scorn such petty meanness.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not know this gardener, and I did not intend to say that he was dishonest, or to cast any imputation upon him.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Fourteenth amendment:

Insert the following:

For pay of horticulturist and assistants in the botanic garden and green-houses, to be expended under the direction of the Library Committee of Congress, $5,121 50.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fifteenth amendment:

Insert the following:

For replazing and repairing damages to the green house by the hail storm of June, 1857, $1,044 16.

The amendment was concurred in.

Sixteenth amendment:

Insert the following:

To enable the Secretary of State to carry into effect the act entitled, "An act for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union," §10,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This is to provide for carrying out the act lately passed by Congress for the admission of Kansas into the Union.

The amendment was concurred in—ayes sixty-three; noes not counted.

Seventeenth amendment:

Insert the following:

And the authority conferred upon the principal clerk of public lands, of acting Commissioner ad interim, in the absence, and so forth, of the Commissioner, by the second section of the act reorganizing the General Land Office, approved the 4th of July, 1836, shall be, and the same hereby is transferred to the chief clerk of said General Land Office.

Mr. GARTRELL. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means what is the meaning of the term "and so forth?"

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It was said by Lord Coke to mean almost anything.

Mr. GARTRELL. I think it means nothing. The amendment was concurred in.

Eighteenth amendment:

Insert as follows:

For the preservation of the collections of the exploring and surveying expeditions of the Government, $4,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

Nineteenth amendment:

Insert as follows:

For the transfer to, and new arrangement of those collections in, the Smithsonian Institution, $1,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

Twentieth amendment:

Insert as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the superintendent of the building occupied by said Secretary and his Department, from the 1st day of January, 1855, to the 30th day of June, 1858, the allowance to be made to such superintendent, with his salary as clerk, not to exceed $2,000 per annum, the sum of $700.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Twenty-first amendment:

Insert as follows:

For clerk hire, office rent, fuel, and lights, at the several district land offices of the land States and Territories, to be apportioned in such manner as, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, the public interest may require, $60,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in that amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Twenty-second amendment:

Strike out of the original bill the following:

"For compensation of the surveyor general of Utah and the clerks in his office, $8,000."

"For rent of the surveyor general's office in Utah, fuel, books, stationery, furniture, and other incidental expenses, $1,500."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence with the Senate in that amendment to strike out this appropriation.

The amendment was concurred in.

Twenty-third amendment:

Under the head of "for the general purposes of the building corner of F and Seventeenth streets," after the clause "for compensation of superintendent, four watchmen, and two laborers for said building, $3,850," insert:

the duties of that officer; the allowance to be made to such superintendent, with his salary as clerk, not to exceed $2,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment, with an amendment to strike out the words "has performed or," so as to strike from it its retrospective operation. They propose to allow this superintendent to have the $250, which is the same allowed to the superintendent of all the other Executive buildings for the future, and not to allow it to apply to the past.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was then concurred in.

Twenty-fourth amendment:

Insert as follows:

For defraying the expenses incurred in taking the census of the Territory of Minnesota, under the act approved 26th February, 1857, $20,000: Provided, The compensation to the officers taking the same shall not exceed that allowed by the acts of 23d May, 1850, and 30th August, 1850, to those who took the census in California, Oregon, Utah, and New Mexico.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This amendment is to pay the expenses of taking the census of Minnesota, which was authorized by the last Congress. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment was concurred in.

Twenty-fifth amendment:

Insert as follows:

For services of special counsel, and other extraordinary expenses, in defending the title of the United States to public property in California, $40,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This amendment proposes to appropriate $40,000. There is an immense amount of public property in litigation in California; and the Attorney General has found it impossible to successfully prosecute the public business without this appropriation of $40,000 to enable him to employ special counsel to defend the several suits which have been instituted, embracing the whole city of San Francisco, and other very valuable public property; and the committee recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether this $40,000 is to be paid in fees to counsel here in Washington or California?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. In California. I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that these claims are very large, and that the claimants have employed the whole bar, if they have not gone further, and employed all the talent of the State; and the Attorney General finds it impossible to defend the interest of the public without the means of employing special counsel.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to say to the committee that, if I am not misinformed, the law establishing a board of land commissioners of the United States for the State of California provided for an attorney of the United States. And then, in a subsequent act, amendatory to that law, additional counsel was provided for. A subsequent law provided still further for the employment of additional counsel.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to have a letter read from the Attorney General upon this subject?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Yes, sir; I will.

The letter was read, as follows:

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE, April 22, 1858.

SIR: Public property in California of very great value is claimed by various persons under alleged grants from Mexico, which are believed to be mere fabrications. These grants cover not only large tracts of agricultural country, and some of the richest mines in the world, but the whole cities of San Francisco and Sacramento are included within them. The Government buildings, the court house, custom-house, hospital, prison, and fortifications, are claimed by titles of the same sort. The site of the military works at San Francisco is so absolutely necessary to the public defense that no sum which could be told down in dollars would be a compensation for its loss. But estimating the grounds and buildings at San Francisco which are in dispute, at the price for which they might be expected to sell if they were in market, they are worth, probably, not less than ten to twelve million dollars. The lots held in the same city by private owners, under titles derived from the United States, are estimated, with their present improvements, at twenty-five to thirty millions.

"The right of the United States and of their grantees to all this property, and to a large quantity besides, in other parts of the State, has been in extreme jeopardy, and is yet in much peril. The pretended grants from Mexico have been forged with skill as well as boldness unequalled in the history of such frauds. The documentary evidence, indeed, was so artfully got up that the local tribunals of the Government in California have been induced to look on them with a certain degree of allowance, and even of favor. The greatest of these cases, that of Limantour—the greatest in atrocity as well as in magnitude—passed through the board of land commissioners and got a decree pronouncing it honest and genuine. It is now pending in the district court. I have examined the evidence before the commissioners, and most of that which has been taken since the appeal, and I am thoroughly satisfied that it is the most stupendous fraud ever perpetrated since the beginning of the world. Thus far it has been successful, because the Executive of the Government has not had the means of resisting it with the vigor which ought to be employed. Other claims, with as little merit as Limantour's, have been even more successful than his.

Under these circumstances, it was thought by the President and by the heads of the several Departments which had charge of the property endangered, to employ special counsel, to be sent out from here to California, with instructions to protect the interests of the Government there, and to give his particular aid, if necessary, his undivided attention to the claim of Limantour. Edwin F. Stanton, Esq., has been employed, and is now performing the duty assigned to him with the ability and fidelity which might be expected from his very high professional character. The sum necessary to pay for the services of special counsel, and the probable cost of getting witnesses from the eastern States, from Mexico, and from other parts of the world, and other expenses incidental to the proper management of causes so large, and the exposure of frauds so complicated, will not be less than $40,000 during the next fiscal year. For this sum I ask that an appropriation be made by Congress.

By the act of—, the sum of $30,000 was appropriated to this purpose. This has been expended, and there is now no fund in the Treasury which is specifically applicable to the payment of the extraordinary expenses which must be encountered in defending against the claims referred to.

By the fee bill of 1853, the fees of counsel specially employed by the head of any Department may be paid out of the general judicial fund. But it is thought better not to leave this case to a provision so general. Its magnitude, and the fact that a specific appropriation was made once before for the same object, seem to require that Congress should give its express sanction to the expenditure. Besides that, a large portion of the sum now asked for is intended for expenses not covered by any general law, but, beyond all doubt, absolutely necessary.

The interests of the United States with reference to these land claims in California have heretofore generally been in the hands of the successive district attorneys. They have been as faithfully and well attended to as they could be by one person. But one person cannot possibly perform the great labor required by them, even if the other business of the office did not require his whole attention. There is no authority to employ an assistant, or even a clerk. I send herewith copies of letters from the present district attorney and his immediate predecessor, from which it appears to me very manifest that the proper relief ought to be granted by a law which will authorize the payment of assistants heretofore employed, and those which it may be necessary to employ hereafter.

Much delay has been encountered in bringing up appeals from the district court to the Supreme Court, caused by the difficulty of getting the records transcribed. They are, of course, very voluminous. The clerk of the district court cannot copy them himself, nor find other persons willing to do it for the fees allowed by law.

To remedy this evil, it will be necessary to authorize the district attorney to contract with the necessary number of clerks to do the work at a reasonable price, not exceeding a certain limit, say one hundred and fifty dollars per month to each of them. I am informed that the transcripts, which should be made now or very soon, will require the labor of three clerks for about five months.

Yours respectfully,
J. S. BLACK.

HON. JAMES L. ORR, Speaker of House of Representatives.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have heard the reference of the Attorney General to the cases of the United States pending in the courts of California. It is well calculated to produce the impression that the necessity for this extraordinary expense is pressing, and, ordinarily, I should yield to the suggestion he makes. But I am opposed to this loose mode of doing business. The law now allows additional counsel to assist the United States attorney before the land commissioners, and we have the United States attorney in each of the districts, in addition. How many lawyers do the United States demand in California? How do we know these expenditures will ever be made in California? Why not at Washington? The law is by no means guarded, and the discretion is left entirely to the Executive to spend this money on such persons, and at such places, as he may think proper. I object to all this. We are told the Limantour claim is that in which a bold and stupendous forgery has been perpetrated. Why, sir, if there had been a forgery of grant in the case, that cannot add much to the difficulty of its management by counsel. It seems to me it would be far preferable to appoint attorneys for the United States who can manage all these cases for the compensation of the office, rather than to be spending these enormous sums in employing additional counsel to attend to our business in court. I do not mean to say the attorneys we now have are not competent, for of that I know nothing, but the idea of spending $40,000 per year in counsel fees for additional counsel in our California cases, certainly indicates that there is wrong somewhere. The Limantour case has been subjected to very critical investigation; everybody in San Francisco is interested against it; and I should think the whole chain of title on which it rests must, by this time, be perfectly understood, and, therefore, that the management of it by counsel would be comparatively easy. I am inclined altogether to withhold my concurrence in this amendment.

The question was taken on the Senate amendment; and it was concurred in.

Twenty-sixth amendment:

For the employment of such number of clerks, not exceeding three, by the district attorney of the northern district of California, as may be necessary to transcribe the records of the district court, in land cases, upon which appeals have been or may be taken to the Supreme Court, such sum as may be necessary is hereby appropriated, provided the compensation shall not exceed one hundred and fifty dollars a month for each.

Mr. QUITMAN. It seems to me that that provision is entirely unnecessary, because it is the duty of the clerk to furnish any transcripts of records which may be required.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It is a physical impossibility in the present state of the records—costing from eight to fifteen hundred dollars—which are got up by the defendants. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Twenty-seventh amendment:

For the reasonable expenses of the late and present district attorneys for the northern district of California, for assistance in their office, such sum is to be paid out of the judicial fund, if such expenses shall be approved by the Attorney General; Provided, That those expenses shall not exceed three hundred dollars per month; And provided further, That this appropriation shall be applicable only to the present fiscal year, and the next succeeding fiscal year, which will terminate on the 30th day of June, 1859.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommended a concurrence in that amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Twenty-eighth amendment:

From the following paragraph strike out "$5,511," and insert in lieu thereof "$7,920," so that it will read:

For the support and maintenance of said penitentiary, $7,920 25.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment. There have been a large number of occupants in the penitentiary lately, and the expenditures being correspondingly increased, this additional appropriation was found necessary.

Mr. GARNETT. I believe that the strict rules of order do not prevail in committee, and I rise to give notice, that I shall ask separate votes on the amendments, which we have passed by, in reference to the Smithsonian Institution. I wish also to state briefly—as I shall have no opportunity of doing it in the House—why I shall do so. Before I had the honor to become a member of this House I noticed the plan of removing the collections of the exploring expeditions of the United States into the Smithsonian Institution, and since then I have been only the more confirmed that it was but the beginning of quartering that institution upon the Federal Government. The first step is to take a part of the Smithsonian building, which, according to its original design, was set apart for a library. You take that room, and the collections of the exploring expeditions are carried there from the Patent Office. The next move is to pay the cost of fitting up that room in their own building; then we shall be asked to supply them with officers to take care of those collections, and it will go on until one half the expense of the institution is paid by the General Government. I believe that this is inexpedient and unconstitutional, and I desire, at the first opportunity, to enter my protest against it.

Mr. ENGLISH. I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman. He has altogether mistaken the object. The object seems to be to quarter the Government upon the Smithsonian Institution, rather than to quarter the Smithsonian Institution upon the Government. This collection of natural history was in the Patent Office. The regents of the Smithsonian Institution consent to relieve the Government from its charge, and that it might be removed to that building, provided the General Government would make provision for taking care of it.

Mr. GARNETT. Is the gentleman willing to vote to strike it all out? He considers that we are upon the bounty of the regents of the Smithsonian Institution in this matter, and therefore I suppose he will be willing to vote it out.

Mr. ENGLISH. I will say that the Smithsonian Institution will not accept this collection, if the expense of keeping it up is to be saddled upon that Institution.

The question was taken; and the amendment was concurred in.

Twenty-ninth amendment:

"For compensation of two additional guards, hereby authorized, $1,320."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The committee recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Thirtieth amendment:

Strike out the following:

"No part of the amount appropriated by any act of Congress for the service of any one fiscal year shall be used for or applied to the service of any other year, nor be transferred to or used for any branch of expenditure than that for which it may be specifically appropriated: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall apply to appropriations for the present or next fiscal year."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Hereafter the estimates for the various Executive Departments shall designate not only the amount required to be appropriated for the next fiscal year, but also the amount of the out-standing appropriation, if there be any, which will probably be required to be used for each particular item of expenditure.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It will be remembered that when this section was added to the bill in the House, I, to some extent, concurred in it. Upon subsequent examination it was found that it would embarrass present arrangements. The present amendment, made by the Senate, will answer every purpose of the original section; and the committee recommend that it shall be concurred in as a substitute.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. When this section of the bill was first offered by me as an amendment, in March last, it received the general consent of the House. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means accepted it, and ingrafted it upon the deficiency bill. When it was offered the other day it was objected to slightly by that gentleman, but it was sustained, on a vote by yeas and nays, by more than two to one. The bill was sent to the Senate, and they ingrafted upon the bill an amendment, by way of a substitute. That amendment is puerile. It amounts to nothing at all. It is nothing more than the existing law. Gentlemen will find in the Executive Documents the very information which the Executive Departments are required to give by this amendment. I regard the original provision as very important. If we intend to check the expenditures of the Government, or if we intend to check the Executive in the use or abuse of money appropriated, we must adopt some such provision as this.

If there ever was any necessity for the transfer of appropriations, that necessity does not exist now. If it ever existed, it was when the expiration of the fiscal year was on the 30th of December, and it was then frequently necessary to use unexpended balances to enable the Government to carry on its operations. But now the appropriation bills are passed before the commencement of each fiscal year. We are now passing appropriation bills for the next fiscal year, which commences July 1, instead of January 1, and none of the money is to be expended until the 1st day of July next. There can therefore be no necessity that any part of the money appropriated for one fiscal year should be used for the next year, for we can now appropriate a sum sufficient for the expenses of the next fiscal year.

Under the old system there could be no accuracy in keeping the public accounts. It was the game of "lap and slam." Under it the expenditures of one year were so mingled with those of another, that no check existed upon disbursing officers, and money which we judged necessary for one branch of the public service was applied to a different purpose. And this was done under a provision of the old law of August, 1842, intended only to apply to the year and bill to which it was attached.

It seems to me that the amendment, which the House has adopted by a vote of two to one, should be adhered to. I do not want the Senate to dictate to the House any longer, or, by its amendments, restrain us from making provisions necessary to protect the Government from extravagant expenditures, and from misapplying the appropriations of public money.

The question was then taken; and the Senate amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that the action of the committee be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The next bill taken up was a bill (H. R. No. 189) making appropriations for the preservation and repair of fortifications and other works of defense, barracks and quarters, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

Mr. WHITELEY. I offer, as a substitute for the bill, the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Let the bill be first read.

The bill was read. It appropriates $350,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the preservation and repairs of fortifications, barracks, and quarters, for the year ending June 30, 1849.

Mr. BLAIR. I believe that, upon this bill, general debate is in order.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I wish to know whether the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means proposes to go on this evening, and take further action upon these appropriation bills?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I desire to go on with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I believe I have the floor. I wish to make a proposition to the committee.

Mr. FLORENCE. Will the gentleman from Missouri give way for a moment?

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say to the committee that I desire to address the committee upon the subject of the Pacific railroad; and if I can get the consent of the committee to print a speech, I will write it out, and not detain the committee by making it.

Mr. ENGLISH. I object. I care not what it is upon.

Mr. WHITELEY. Mr. Chairman, how did I lose the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. FLORENCE. If the gentleman from Delaware will give way, I desire to make a suggestion to the committee.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I rise to a question of order. The first section of the bill has been read. Am I not entitled to the floor, to explain the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The practice of the committee, as the Chair understands it, has been that the gentleman reporting the bill under consideration is entitled to the floor, if he claims it, when the bill is taken up. The Chair assigned the floor to the gentleman from Missouri, supposing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not desire to occupy it.

Mr. GROW. I desire, with the consent of the gentleman from Missouri, to make a proposition to the committee, and to my colleague, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, which, I presume, will be satisfactory to all parties; it is, that the committee go on with business as long as it is the desire of the committee, and that when we get through with business we will take a recess, with the understanding that the gentleman from Missouri shall have the floor after the recess, and that no business shall be transacted.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. As I stated yesterday, I concur in that arrangement, and hope the committee will agree to it.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, that will be the understanding.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to make a suggestion which will perhaps facilitate the business of the committee. The fortification bill, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, contains but a single clause. The amendment which the gentleman from Delaware has indicated his purpose to offer, contains fifteen, twenty, or thirty items. Now, I propose that, by unanimous consent, that amendment be printed, so that gentlemen may know exactly what it is when we resume the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that it is not in the power of the committee to order the printing of the amendment.

Mr FLORENCE. It has been the practice to do it by unanimous consent.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If my colleague will turn to page 199 of the book of estimates, he will find printed there the whole of the matter which the gentleman from Delaware proposes to offer.

I desire to explain the bill now under consideration, but I shall not detain the committee long. The appropriations made last year for fortifications amounted to $3,971,300. The estimates for last year amounted to $2,541,300. The appropriations, therefore, exceeded the estimates $1,430,000. The amount estimated for 1859, the next fiscal year, is $1,931,000. The amount reported by the Committee of Ways and Means is $350,000, reducing the estimates for the next fiscal year $1,581,000. The large estimate made last year, when the Treasury was full, was to carry on an extensive system of building and improving fortifications at the different points where fortifications have been started. It was the desire of the Committee of Ways and Means to dispense with the whole system, as far as they could consistently with existing contracts; and it was the opinion of the committee that $350,000, left to the discretion of the Secretary of War, would preserve and keep in repair all the forts for at least one year. That is why the committee reduced the estimates. If it is the will of Congress that these works shall be carried on and completed, it will require every dollar that the gentleman from Delaware proposes to appropriate. But the Committee of Ways and Means came to the conclusion that it was high time that we should be economical, and they have taken the responsibility of recommending that only so much shall be appropriated as is necessary to keep the works in repair.

Mr. WHITELEY obtained the floor.

Mr. PHILLIPS. With the permission of the gentleman from Delaware, I desire to ask my colleague a question. I wish to know for what specific items this sum of $350,000 is appropriated?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It is left under the discretion of the Secretary of War, to be used at any point where repairs may be necessary.

Mr. WHITELEY. I desire to offer the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following as a substitute:

That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications, barracks, and quarters, for the year ending June 30, 1859:

For repairs of Fort Mackinac, Michigan, $9,000.
For repairs of Fort Wayne, Detroit, Michigan, $50,000.
For repairs of Fort Niagara, New York, $50,000.
For repairs of Fort Ontario, New York, $50,000.
For Fort Montgomery, outlet of Lake Champlain, $50,000.
For Fort Knox, at the narrows of the Penobscot river, Maine, $50,000.

For Fort Knox, at the entrance of Kennebec river, Maine, $25,000.

For Fort Knox, at Hog Island ledge, in Portland harbor, $50,000.

For Fort Warren, Boston harbor, and preservation of its site, $30,000.

For Fort Winthrop, Governor's Island, Boston harbor, $30,000.

For Fort Adams, and protection of site, Newport harbor, Rhode Island, $25,000.

For fort at Wille's Point, opposite Fort Schuyler, New York, $100,000.

For Fort Richmond, Staten Island, New York harbor, $100,000.

For repairs of Fort Wood, New York harbor, New York, $20,000.

For repairs of Fort Columbus and Castle William, New York harbor, New York, $6,000.

For Fort Delaware, on Delaware river, $10,000.

For Fort Carroll, Soller's Point flats, Baltimore harbor, Maryland, $100,000.

For Fort Calhoun, Hampton Roads, Virginia, $75,000.

For Fort Macon, and preservation of site, North Carolina, $10,000.

For Fort Caswell, and preservation of site, North Carolina, $10,000.

For Fort Sumpter, Charleston harbor, South Carolina, $25,000.

For Fort Moultrie, preservation of site, South Carolina, $10,000.

For repairs of quarters and barracks at Fort Johnson, South Carolina, $8,000.

For Fort Pulaski, Savannah river, Georgia, $10,000.

For repairs of Fort Jackson, Savannah river, Georgia, $20,000.

For Fort Clinch, entrance to Cumberland sound, Florida, $75,000.

For Fort Taylor, Key West, Florida, $100,000.

For Fort Jefferson, Garden Key, Florida, $200,000.

For repairs of Fort Pickens, Pensacola harbor, Florida, $50,000.

For repairs of Fort McRea, and preservation of site, Pensacola harbor, Florida, $29,000.

For Fort Barracas, Pensacola harbor, Florida, $27,000.

For repairs of Fort Morgan, Mobile bay, Alabama, $50,000.

For Fort Gaines, Dauphin Island, entrance to Mobile bay, Alabama, $50,000.

For defense of Proctor's Landing, Lake Boyne, Louisiana, $25,000.

For repairs of Fort Macomb, and preservation of site, Louisiana, $4,000.

For repairs of Fort Pike, and preservation of site, Louisiana, $5,000.

For repairs and extension of Fort St. Philip, Mississippi river, Louisiana, $10,000.

For Fort Livingston, Grand Terré Island, Barratarra bay, Louisiana, and preservation of its site, $50,000.

For Fort at Fort Point, San Francisco bay, California, $350,000.

For contingent expenses of fortifications, for preservation of sites, protection of titles, and repairs of sudden damages, $30,000.

For repairs and alteration of barracks, quarters, hospitals, store-rooms, and fences at permanent forts not occupied by troops, $15,000.

For the construction of permanent platforms for modern cannon of large caliber, in existing fortifications of important harbors, $50,000.

Mr. QUITMAN. With the permission of the gentleman from Delaware, I wish to say that I have some general observations to make upon this bill; and I notify the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that, as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs—and I believe I speak the sentiments of a majority of that committee—I cannot consent to a general bill authorizing the Secretary of War to apply the whole amount of the appropriation to any single work.

It is an appropriation in gross of so much money, without specifying a single object to which it is to be applied. That is a species of legislation which is new, and, I believe, unexampled; for which there is no precedent. I cannot agree, and I hope the House will not agree to it. Our system of fortifications is in the future. Some years ago, the chief of the engineer corps, General Totten, reported a plan which was considered at the time as extravagant, for the fortification of the whole coast of the United States.

That general system has been entered upon and then abandoned; and for the several years past we have had no system at all; we have taken up a post here and a post there; and I am therefore opposed to any extensive appropriations for this purpose until we have some system to go on.

But I am wholly opposed to such legislation as is now proposed. It is, I believe, neither proper nor in accordance with any precedent to appropriate a gross sum of money for repairs and preservation of fortifications, to be expended as the Secretary of War may think proper. He has, it is true, sent estimates here, but the estimates are no guide which would bind him in the expenditure of such an appropriation. He may, if he thinks proper, expend the whole amount upon a single fortification. If I could ever trust any friend with such a discretion, I would cheerfully yield that confidence to the present Secretary of War; but I am unwilling, as a legislator, that any such legislation should be introduced here.

I have merely brought this matter to the attention of the committee. I concur with the Committee of Ways and Means in their attempts at retrenchment. I think that, considering the fact that we have no system of fortification, and considering the state of the public Treasury, it would be unwise to go into an extensive expenditure which a general system of fortifications would require.

While, therefore, I concur in the general objects the committee had in view, I cannot, as a member of this House, consent to confer upon the Secretary of War this discretionary power. We have a better knowledge of the wants of the various works in our several localities than the Secretary of War can have. We know how much is needed for repairs or preservation of forts, and it is our duty to specify where the appropriations which we make are to be expended. I have no wish to find any fault in regard to the sum which it is proposed to appropriate. I think some such sum is necessary to keep these several works in repair; but I do object most seriously to the form in which it is proposed to appropriate it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I understand the gentleman from Mississippi to approve the reduction of the estimates; but that he wishes the items.

Mr. QUITMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Will the gentleman agree to strike it all out?

Mr. QUITMAN. No, sir.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I should have no objection to strike out the whole sum. I will say to the gentleman that we did not insert the items in the bill, because we had not the information before us on which we could with any degree of certainty determine what was needed at the different localities, and we therefore determined to make the appropriation in gross, and leave it with the Secretary of War to expend where, in his judgment, it was needed.

Mr. QUITMAN. With all due respect to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I think the only true way by which we can arrive at any satisfactory result is to refer this bill back to the Committee of Ways and Means, and let them ascertain how much money is needed for the repair and preservation of each particular work.

Mr. WHITELEY obtained the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the gentleman from Delaware will permit me for a moment, I desire to state, from a private memorandum, the way in which we arrived at the sum which we have reported. I give the works, with the amount estimated for each.

The amount reported "was for the preservation and repairs of fortifications, barracks, and quarters," and was intended to cover the following points: Fort Mackinac, Michigan, $9,000; Fort Wayne, Detroit, Michigan, $50,000; Fort Niagara, New York, $50,000; Fort Ontario, New York, $50,000; Fort Wood, New York, $20,000; Fort Columbus and Castle William, $6,000; Fort Johnson, South Carolina, $6,000; Fort Jackson, Georgia, $20,000—$211,000. Fort Pickens, Florida, $50,000; Fort McRea, Florida, $29,000; Fort Morgan, Alabama, $50,000; Fort Macomb, Louisiana, $4,000; Fort Pike, Louisiana, $5,000; Fort St. Philip, Louisiana, $10,000—$359,000.

This private memorandum contains the data from which the amount we have reported was arrived at. The gross amount of the several items is $359,000. We simply reported $350,000.

Mr. WHITELEY. The amendment which I have offered is exactly the estimates which were sent to Congress by the Secretary of War, and nothing more. The aggregate sum appropriated is about one million nine hundred thousand dollars.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to reflect upon the Committee of Ways and Means; but I must be permitted to say that, in my humble judgment, they might just as well have reported $350,000 to be thrown into the canal, as to have reported that sum for the repairs and preservation of the fortifications of this Union.

We are, if not on the eve of war, at the beginning of an angry dispute with one of the greatest Powers of the world; and in what condition are our fortifications from one end of the country to the other? Some not commenced; others just under way, and most of them unfinished. Yet the committee recommend the paltry sum of $350,000—to do what? To keep them in repair. Does any man, when he gets his house up to the eaves, talk about putting boards on the top to keep it in repair?

As an illustration, I will refer to Fort Delaware, in the Delaware river. This Government has spent there about one million dollars. The fort is about three fourths finished; the embrasures for the first tier of guns entirely completed, and part of the second; some of the arches completed—a majority, however, only half turned—all exposed to the weather. Suppose $350,000 is now appropriated and expended for boards and other materials to cover up the work already done on this fortification—for its "preservation," as this bill expresses it—will it not result in a loss to the Government? If you do not go on and finish a building which has already progressed far towards completion, do you not lose from twenty-five to fifty per cent. of the money you have already expended? I say, and on information from the engineer in charge of the work I have referred to, that if it is not now finished the Government will lose from two to four hundred thousand dollars.

Talk about preserving a building by allowing it to remain unfinished, when it has been half built! Every man who knows anything about house-building knows that it cannot be done, and so it is with works of national defense. Is it not our duty, then, as members of this House, to whom, with the other branch, have been intrusted the interests and the honor of this country, to see that our national defenses are put in such a condition that if the occasion demanded, they would protect us from the invasion of an enemy?

Mr. Chairman, I am not able to give an opinion on this matter, and make no pretension to any such ability. What I say is founded upon the testimony of military engineers. What does the Secretary of War say? What do the military engineers of the country say? They all recommend, as a matter of policy and economy, the completion of these works. Here is what the Secretary of War says:

"The report of the chief engineer will inform you of the character and condition of our sea-coast defenses. It will be seen that these works are gradually, but certainly, advancing towards completion, and, when finished, will constitute a system of maritime defenses formidable in extent, and of great magnitude.

"New York, the great heart of commerce on this continent, where more and greater interests concentrate than at any point on our Atlantic coast, may be considered as impregnable from any attack from the sea when the fortifications now in progress shall be finished. The fortifications will be better, the guns heavier and more numerous than those of Sebastopol.

"Upon the general system of sea-coast defense, it is hardly necessary to say a word at this day. The policy of the Government seems to be fixed in that respect, and wisely, too, no doubt, if the works be prosecuted with a wise economy. Fortifications are now very justly esteemed the cheapest and far the most effectual means of defense for every important commercial point; with the heavy guns of the present day, no fleet can match a fortification; and, when completed, these works can be kept in perfect repair at a very trifling cost until needed for actual service. A fortification costing not much more than double the sum necessary to build and equip a first-class line of battle ship, will constitute a formidable defense for a harbor, and will continue to do so throughout any length of time. The value of this mode of defense is becoming more apparent every day. As our population increases, and the facilities for intercommunication are multiplied, a military force of any extent can, with more and more readiness, be concentrated at any given point in the shortest possible time. Fortifications, which will naturally retard the landing of a foreign foe, must give time to concentrate a force at any given point equal to any emergency. A larger force could be thrown into New York in two weeks, by means of internal communication, than could be brought there from abroad in a year by all the means which any European Power could possibly command.

"Our ramified system of railroads spreading throughout the whole country—those shrews of iron which bind with indissoluble ties the commercial interests of our community—confer upon the nation a capability for defense which obviates forever the necessity of standing armies, or of a Navy more numerous than is necessary to give protection to our ships in the prosecution of our extended commerce."

In this appropriation of $350,000, as was well said by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUIMMAN] it is left to be sent hither and thither, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, and not to be applied to any particular work. It is totally inadequate to keep these forts in repair, and is $25,000 below the estimate made by the Secretary of War for that specific purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I will refer to another point. The deed of cession from the State of Delaware to the Government of the United States in reference to the land upon which Fort Delaware is built, was upon the express condition that the Government should erect a fort there and keep it up. Is Congress fulfilling that condition to the State of Delaware when it has left that fort unconstructed since 1832? The old fort there was burned down in 1832, and although the Government took the cession from the State on the condition I have stated, yet for twenty-six years it has left that solemn obligation unexecuted.

I think that nearly every State in the Union making a like concession, made it upon a like condition. Therefore on that ground alone the Government is bound to complete these works. We only ask for a small sum comparatively. We ask for $2,000,000. What is $2,000,000, if properly expended, in perfecting these means of defense, if we get into war with any of the European Powers, I care not which, even the weakest of them? And at any rate it is our duty, as wise legislators, in time of peace to prepare for war. We have, in the other branch, already a proposition pending for a loan of $15,000,000. If the scenes which have been enacted in the Gulf and upon the coast of Cuba be continued, the consequences which will be forced upon this Government will demand the raising of twice as much. How do we stand this day? What is our Navy compared with that of other maritime Powers? What is it compared with the navies of France, England, and Russia? If we come into conflict with either, as we are now, will any gentleman say that our Navy would not be wiped out?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I say that it cannot be wiped out.

Mr. WHITELEY. Our Navy is now, compared with that of England, as one is to twenty. I boast of our Navy, and of the ability of America, and "Young America," to do a great deal yet. I do not want our Navy, in its present condition, sent into conflict with the navy of England. I know that we have a strong recuperative power, and particularly in the section of country from which my friend from Illinois comes. I know that in time we can gather a Navy which will compete with that of any in the world. Ship for ship, and gun for gun, I have no fear for our noble little Navy. But where would it be, in its present condition, it was sent against that of England? It will not do for us to act the braggadocio when we go into a fight. We must have ships and guns. We have got the men. It is the duty of Congress to provide the stone, wooden, and iron walls to defend our sea-coast against the navy of a foreign Power, and endeavor to prevent our Navy from being driven from the high seas. Does the gentleman from Illinois doubt for a moment that, in a war with Great Britain, her navy could take every sea-coast town on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I deny it in toto.

Mr. LOVEJOY. No, sir; it could not touch them.

Mr. MORGAN. Yeas and nays on that. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITELEY. The Secretary of War, in his report, says that when we finish the defenses around New York it will be as impregnable as Sebastopol. How impregnable was that? Did not the allies take it? But his report shows that, without continuing and finishing its fortifications, New York will not be impregnable at all; and I know not a sea-port town from Maine to Florida that has defenses sufficient to prevent an enemy's fleet from sailing right up to its wharves. There is not a fort on the whole Delaware except Fort Mifflin; and that is not strong enough to keep back a single vessel from going up to Philadelphia. New York is the best defended city in the Union; but the report of the Secretary of War shows that it can only be rendered impregnable by finishing its fortifications.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the question comes down simply to this: shall we, in our present difficult position in regard to foreign Powers, leave our fortifications in their present unfinished state, or shall we appropriate the sum asked—$1,900,000—to complete them?

I think, Mr. Chairman, that it needs but slight reflection on the part of the committee, to see that the amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill is totally inadequate for the purposes for which the committee intend it. We have no defenses on our Pacific coast. The amendment which I have offered provides for the construction of forts in California, and for the construction of the forts on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, while the bill only provides for keeping those already built in repair. Now, I think it is the duty of Congress to give to the Administration, which is held responsible for protecting our citizens, the means by which the Executive can protect the country and the citizens thereof. Would it be any justification for us to say, in the event of a war with either of the Governments that I have named, and in the event of one of our large cities falling into their power, that we had appropriated the sum of $350,000 for keeping our fortifications in repair? Could not and would not the President turn on us and say: "Your Secretary of War estimated that, to put these fortifications in a proper state of repair, some $1,900,000 was needed, and you refused to vote it to me, to vote it to him, to vote it to the country, and, therefore, your cities are now in the power of your enemies, and I am helpless in your hands?"

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to detain the committee on this matter. My chief argument upon it is that I have offered an amendment which proposes to appropriate no more than what is estimated for by those who are competent to judge. It appropriates $1,900,000, it is true, but that is but as a drop in the bucket, when we consider the wants of our national defenses. I therefore hope that the committee will adopt my amendment as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. DOWDELL. I have a few words to say, Mr. Chairman, on the amendment proposed, and I hope the committee will indulge me a few moments. As a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, I do not wish to be understood as responsible for the bill that has been reported by the committee, for I was opposed to it, and endeavored to have it reconsidered, so as to embrace the estimates of the Secretary of War. I am opposed to it now, and in favor of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. WHITELEY.] I think I can demonstrate to the committee, if I can get its attention, that it would be false economy, worse than folly, to give away $350,000 for repairs and preservations only. We should delay a whole year, and at the end of it our fortifications would be in a worse condition than they are now. In the mean time, we should have disbanded all our workmen who are skilled in carrying on the work, and we should have cut off the usual and established sources of supply, forfeited contracts for materials, and expended a large sum which would be found necessary to preserve the works from injury during the period of suspension, not a cent of which would go to further their efficiency. And at the close of the year we should have to commence operations under great disadvantages. Suppose the works to be found in as good condition as they are now: months would be required to reestablish active operations, open and reanimate channels of supply, gather the necessary materials, and organize the laborers. The appropriations for the completion of the works will have to be made at some time or other. Most of these forts are in progress of construction. Some of them are nearly finished. Some of them are just above the water.

Mr. MORGAN. Would the gentleman from Alabama be willing to apply the same rule to harbors on the great lakes, where hundreds of millions of dollars are engaged in commerce, where thousands of lives are being annually sacrificed? Would he go for these improvements as well as for these fortifications? If he will, I will go with him in his efforts—if not, I will not.

Mr. DOWDELL. I will consider that question when it arises. It is not now before us for consideration. The question before us is, whether we will make the appropriations estimated for by the Secretary of War, for the continuation of fortifications? It has nothing to do with the question about internal improvements. What is the sum asked for? Little over one million nine hundred thousand dollars. Call it two millions. What is the interest on that sum? One hundred and twenty thousand dollars. The sum required could be readily obtained. We could borrow it perhaps at less than six per cent. Three times the annual interest of the sum is now asked to be appropriated simply for repairs and preservation of these works; and which, when expended, would leave them, very likely, in a worse condition than they are now in.

My attention, Mr. Chairman, has been principally called to the forts at Key West and on the Tortugas, in the Gulf of Mexico. Fort Taylor, on Key West, has mounted its second tier of guns; and an appropriation is asked to mount its third tier of guns, and to give it a bomb-proof roof. These two forts—Fort Taylor and Fort Jefferson—are in a position to control the Gulf of Mexico. All the vast trade of the valley of the Mississippi, and its tributaries through the north-west, pass over the Gulf of Mexico. Such a power as England or France could, with its navy, come into the Gulf and take possession of the Tortugas, Garden Key, or Key West, and commit depredations on our commerce; and it would be impossible, with our Navy, to dislodge them. But if these forts were completed, we could keep back any navy, and afford protection to the whole coast of the Gulf. They overlook Havana, Pensacola, Mobile, and all the important points of the Gulf of Mexico. For the fortifications on the Tortugas, an appropriation of $200,000 is asked. That fort has just been raised above water. It is prepared for the mounting of the first tier of guns. The tedious, tardy process of laying the foundations has been gone through with, and every dollar now appropriated will go to promote the efficiency of the work.

My friend from Delaware alluded to the contingency of a war with Great Britain. No one deprecates war more than I do. In its desolating track are found not only misery, wretchedness, and poverty, the sorrows of widowhood and orphanage, but vice and crime multiply in the dark seasons of strife. I hope that war may never come. To prevent its occurrence we should not only be always ready to defend ourselves, but prompt to resist aggression. I love peace; not a peace, however, purchased by submission to insult; that would be too dear a price; but a peace with our national honor untarnished. Sir, occurrences have recently taken place in the Gulf of Mexico which call for a bold and vigorous policy on our part. To meet the expectations of the American people we must hold these violators of law, for such outrages, to a strict account. The Administration, I understand, have sent out orders to protect our vessels from further molestation. I hope the order has likewise been given to arrest every officer who was engaged in searching our vessels, and to bring him into our ports for trial. These cases are too flagrant to await the delays of diplomacy. They are of design, not accidental. My doctrine would be, broad-sides first, explanation afterwards. No pretext can justify these wanton insults to our flag. I have every confidence that this Administration will do its duty. The popular heart will respond to the boldest policy. My people, I know, stand ready to make any sacrifice to maintain the national honor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask, is it not the part of wisdom to go on and complete our fortifications? Shall we leave those important points in the Gulf in an exposed condition, and thus invite the first attacks of the enemy? They can be finished with a comparatively small sum of money, and in a very short time. The materials are being collected; the workmen, well trained, are at the place, and all necessary arrangements made for a speedy completion. Aside from any contingency of war, considerations of economy ought to induce us to grant the appropriations asked by the Secretary. But there are some other important works on the Gulf coast to which I will also call the attention of the committee. For the defense of Mobile bay, there are two works—Fort Morgan on the right of entrance, which covers the main entrance, and Fort Gaines on the left. The former has been finished; the small sum asked for is to substitute the heavier armament now in process of execution, and for increased provision for the garrison. The latter, Fort Gaines, has been recently commenced. The object of this work is to cross its fire with the other, and sweep the channel on its own side. Without this work in a state of efficiency, an enemy's steamers could pass up and put the city of Mobile under contribution. The security of the vast commerce of that region requires that these works should be prosecuted to completion. In a greater or less degree the same reasons apply generally to our defensive works. The opinions of our military men are favorable to permanent fortifications; and the late wars in Europe have confirmed these opinions in favor of such defensive system. The events in the Black and Baltic seas, where the combined and powerful navies of France and England accomplished but little, furnish additional reason why we should foster this system of defense, and keep all our works in a state of efficiency. I trust that the committee will take a practical view of this subject, and grant the appropriations necessary to finish these most important works. It is the part of economy to do so. Let not the reduced condition of the Treasury deter us from fortifying the main points on our coast, and making the necessary preparation for the proper reception of any and all enemies. I do not wish to confine these appropriations to any one section; let all portions claim our attention; but I have spoken more particularly for the works on the Gulf, because it offers rich booty to an enemy, and, unless the forts now in progress be completed, will be the most exposed and defenseless part of our coast. Every dollar asked for by the Secretary is necessary, and I hope the committee will sustain the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LETCHER. The Committee of Ways and Means seem to be exceedingly unfortunate. It has not been more than two months since they were arraigned in this House for refusing to cut down Government estimates. The committee were charged with conforming their action to the recommendations from the other end of the avenue, and for bringing in bills for whatever was asked for by the officers of the Government there located. Now we come in to-day with a bill in which we have undertaken to reduce the appropriations from the estimates, and the first thing we hear is, that the Committee of Ways and Means have not done their duty in making this reduction. So, let us reduce, or fail to reduce, we are still arraigned before the House, censured, and condemned.

As my friend from Alabama [Mr. DOWDELL] seems to be in a mood for making confessions for his sins, I desire to call attention to one or two things. I went for this reduction in the committee, and I shall maintain the necessity and propriety of that reduction in what I have to say now. If my memory is not very greatly at fault, the committee were unanimous in recommending this bill. Now, sir, I know that afterwards, when some complaint was made in regard to it, and when gentlemen from abroad came here complaining that certain appropriations were not made in which they were interested, the matter began to attract more attention, and to become a matter of conference between members of the committee. But until that time, unless I am greatly mistaken, the committee were a unit in regard to this bill.

Mr. DOWDELL. At the time this bill was reported, our vessels had not been boarded in the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. LETCHER. No, sir; nor when my friend from Alabama wanted to reconsider it in the committee. Now, sir, the gentleman tells us that our ships have been boarded in the Gulf; that there have been seizures and searches; and that he is desirous that the President of the United States shall take the necessary steps to protect the honor of the country. I imagine, sir, that the President of the United States will do his duty in that regard; but it strikes me as remarkable that it did not occur to the gentleman, when talking of broad-sides now and explanations hereafter, that those forts down there were unfinished. I take it, if those forts are so indispensably necessary, and if the country cannot be defended without them, it would be bad policy in us to open a controversy with a Power which the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. WHITELEY] tells us has a navy twenty times as large as our own, by firing broadsides into her. I take it that our people are prepared at all times to defend their rights whenever they are assailed by any nation, however powerful that nation may be. There is something in the past history of our Government which assures us that whenever occasion requires, there are stout hearts and strong arms enough to protect our rights, let the assailing party be who it may. As it has been in the day of our infancy, so it will be now, when we are approaching a nation's growth.

But the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. WHITELEY] tells us that the Government of the United States has contracted with a State which may have ceded real estate to the Government for fortification purposes to erect a fort thereon; and he demands that it shall be done; and he charges bad faith if it is not done. But, sir, that is not the work of a day, a year, or even ten years. Where ever the Government received those cessions from the States, she received them to make her improvements there, by fortifications or otherwise, according to her judgment in regard to time, and the amount of annual appropriation she should give for the purpose of improvement.

But what does the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. WHITELEY] propose? He proposes not only to prosecute works already begun, but to begin others.

Mr. WHITELEY. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. LETCHER. At any rate, the gentleman's argument amounts to that.

If I recollect aright, during the compromise Congress of 1849-50 no appropriation at all was made for fortification purposes. And I think also, that in the first Congress in which I was here—in 1851-52—no appropriations were made at that session either, for the prosecution of these improvements. Was it not just as important then that these fortifications should be carried on? Was not the country in just as great danger from aggressions from abroad then as it is at this day? I imagine it was; and yet I have not heard that the country has suffered any particular detriment in consequence of the failure on those two occasions to appropriate the money.

Sir, I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] to a very great extent, that these appropriations heretofore, and while the Treasury has been full, have been made without any regard to system; that money has been taken from the Treasury to be applied here and there and everywhere, when, in all probability, if we had been in straitened circumstances, the number of forts commenced, and that have since been continued, would have been limited compared to the number now on hand.

I say, then, sir, that we can now protect this country, and yet not embarrass it by increasing its obligations in the borrowing of money, or otherwise for this purpose. Why should this Government be borrowing money to build forts and custom-houses and other improvements of this sort? I take it that these points can wait until a more propitious season, when the commercial embarrassment shall pass away, when trade and business shall begin to revive; when imports shall be coming into the country and the Government realizing from those imports the means necessary to carry on its operations, and to prosecute these improvements.

But, sir, there is another point of view in which to look at this question. Suppose the troubles which seem to be apprehended by the gentleman from Alabama should grow up between the United States and England, can these forts be completed in time for the purpose? If that apprehension is felt, if there is really danger of war, if our Navy is so weak, in comparison with the navies of other nations, is it not better that we should husband our resources so that we may have them on hand for the purpose of directing them to an increase of our Navy and to an increase of our land forces, preparatory to this trial of strength? So it strikes me. All that you spend now upon these improvements is so much money sunk for the time. I think it the part of policy and wisdom to delay these operations, and to reserve our funds, so that, if that evil hour should come which is apprehended, we may be prepared to apply them in that way which will give us the best protection and the best defense against a foreign enemy.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think the committee are prepared to vote; and I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. That will test the sense of the committee on the amendment.

Mr. BOWIE. I desire to propose an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois takes precedence of all other motions, and is not debatable.

Mr. MASON. I ask for tellers on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON and UNDERWOOD were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes ninety-three, noes not counted.

So Mr. WASHBURN's motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 201 making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, and had directed him to report back the same with a recommendation that some of the amendments be concurred in, some concurred in with amendments, and others non-concurred in. Also, that the committee had had under consideration the fortification bill, and had directed him to report the same back, with a recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move the previous question on the amendments of the Senate to bill No. 201.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. GROW. I suppose there will be yeas and nays upon these amendments. I hope the House will go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of general debate.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the gentleman will permit me, I do not propose to act upon these amendments to-night. I wish, by general consent, to have the previous question seconded on the other bill, and then go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purposes of general debate.

Mr. QUITMAN. I do not wish to be prejudiced by the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in my right to move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to present specific items of appropriation for the several fortifications.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question be now seconded on the fortification bill, it will have exhausted itself when the House shall have acted upon the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to strike out the enacting clause. The Chair will then hold under consideration, at least for to-night, the question whether, if the House refuse to strike out the enacting clause, they may then proceed to pass the bill without considering it in Committee of the Whole. The Chair has very great doubts whether, inasmuch as the committee have not considered the bill—having only reported in favor of striking out the enacting clause, the rule requiring that the bill making, as it does, an appropriation, must be first considered there, it can be considered now in the House.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Is it not in order to move to recommit after the previous question has been seconded, if the main question has not been ordered to be put?

The SPEAKER. It will not; but the previous question will have exhausted itself when the House has acted upon the proposition to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I understood unanimous consent to have been given to me to demand the previous question upon the fortification bill to-night; then, I understand the Chair to decide that if the House refuse to strike out the enacting clause, the bill will be open to amendment or commitment.

The SPEAKER. If the House shall refuse to strike out the enacting clause, it will be in order to move to recommit; and the Chair will hold under consideration whether it will be competent to order the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, until it shall have been first considered in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to give notice that I shall object to any attempt to pass this bill until it has been considered in the Committee of the Whole. I hold that neither this nor any other appropriation bill can be amended or first considered in the House.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put, upon the fortification bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider to vote by which the main question was ordered on the two bills; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of general debate.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BILLINGHURST in the chair.)

Mr. ENGLISH. I move to take up House bill (No. 539) providing for certain public buildings for post office and other governmental purposes.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I make the question of order that it is not in order to move to take up any bill upon the Calendar except the appropriation bills. If the gentleman wishes to arrive at this bill he can only do so by commencing at the first bill on the Calendar and laying the bills aside, one by one, until he arrives at the bill which he wishes to take up.

Mr. ENGLISH. The bill I have moved to take up is a bill making appropriations for certain post-office purposes, and the motion is in order.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I propose to take up one of the regular appropriation bills.

Mr. MASON. I propose to make a compromise, which I have no doubt will be satisfactory to both gentlemen. I move to take up the old soldiers' pension bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I submit to the Chair—

Mr. ENGLISH. No debate is in order. If the gentleman takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair, let him take it; otherwise I insist upon my motion being put.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. What is the first bill upon the Calendar?

Mr. GROW. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] was entitled to the floor by the consent of the committee when it last rose; and unless he yields it, nobody has a right to take it from him.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one point of order already pending.

Mr. HOUSTON. The question now is whether there is a bill up or not. I propose that we take up the next general appropriation bill, and let the debate go on on that.

Mr. ENGLISH. I have made a motion, and I ask that the question be put.

Mr. BOWIE. Are we now in committee for business, or merely for the purpose of general discussion?

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is, "Which bill shall first be taken up?" The committee is now in session by general consent for general debate.

Mr. HUGHES. I move that the committee take a recess for an hour and a half, to give the Chair time to consider all the questions of order.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. That is in violation of the agreement.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope that the Sergeant-at-Arms will get as near this crowd as he can, and read the riot act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain no question until order is restored. The Chair overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GROW.] The Chair recognized the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] on a bill which has been disposed of. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ENGLISH] was recognized then, and he moved that the committee proceed to the consideration of the post office bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] next moved that the committee take up one of the general appropriation bills.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. When the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, have I not the right to be recognized, for the purpose of moving to take up one of the general appropriation bills?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman would, by courtesy.

Mr. ENGLISH. I wish to ask a question, and that is, whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania, because he happens to be the head of a particular committee, has the right to engross the entire attention of the House and of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and whether the chairmen of other committees have not some rights, as well as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means?

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. ENGLISH to take up the House bill (No. 539) providing for certain public buildings for post offices, and other public purposes.

Mr. ENGLISH demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ADRAIN and PETTIT were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-four, noes not counted.

So Mr. ENGLISH's motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. There is a desire to take up a bill upon which discussion may take place. I insist upon the enforcement of the rule, that the first bill on the Calendar shall be read; and if there is any objection to its consideration, the question shall be put, whether the committee will consider it.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The first bill on the Calendar was then reported, being a bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

No objection being made, the bill was taken up for consideration, Mr. BLAIR being entitled to the floor.

The committee was then addressed by Messrs. BLAIR, PURVIANCE, OTERO, TAYLOR of Louisiana, BENNETT, DAVIS of Massachusetts, STEVENS of Washington, and KELLY. [These speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. BOWIE. I desire to discuss some of the topics alluded to in the speech of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. TAYLOR.] But as the hour is late, I do not wish to go on to-night, and I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman [Mr. HOWARD] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1859, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. BOWIE, (at a quarter before eleven o'clock,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 26, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. SEPTIMUS TUSTIN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. STUART presented a petition of citizens of northern Michigan, praying that a homestead of eighty acres of land may be granted to each of the mixed-blood Indians residing in that section of the State; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying that the Indian agency of that State may be divided into two agencies, and that the northern agency be located at Michilimackinac; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SEWARD presented a paper signed by Charles T. Platt and H. B. Sawyer, in behalf of those officers of the Navy who were transferred from the furlough to the leave-of-absence list, asking that provision may be made for allowing them the difference of pay between those grades to the time they were so transferred; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of William H. De Groot, praying indemnity for losses sustained by him under his contract with Captain Meigs for furnishing brick for the Washington aqueduct, in consequence of the failure of the Government to provide the means for carrying on the work; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a resolution of the Board of Aldermen and Board of Common Council of Georgetown, District of Columbia, protesting against the passage of any measure for receding any portion of that city to the county of Washington; also, a memorial of citizens of Georgetown, some of whom reside upon the "Heights," remonstrating against the prayer of certain citizens of that place, who petitioned Congress to pass an act to exclude that portion of Georgetown called the "Heights" from the corporate limits of the city; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and a motion by him to print the resolution and memorial was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of Stephen Shinn, praying payment for materials furnished and money advanced to Samuel Colt, in aid of his experiment with the submarine battery in 1843 and 1844; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. KENNEDY presented the memorial of Rezin Orme, praying compensation for services as a clerk in the Second Auditor's office; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BROWN presented a memorial of members of the bar of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, praying that compensation may be allowed to James S. Morsell, assistant judge of the said court, for services as judge of appeals from decisions of the Commissioner of Patents; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a resolution of the corporation of Georgetown, District of Columbia, in favor of the location of a national foundry near that place; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. PUGH presented the memorial of A. G. Sloo, praying the intervention of the Senate in support of his contract for transporting the mails from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, by the Isthmus of Tehuantepec; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SLIDELL, it was Ordered, That the petition of Peter P. Paillet, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the memorial of Charles J. Swett.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHIELDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 408) for the construction of a military road from Seattle to Fort Colville, in the Territory of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. POLK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 409) making an appropriation for the completion of connected sections of a road from Albuquerque, in New Mexico, to the Colorado river; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 540) to provide for the lighting with gas certain streets across the Mall, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 248) regulating municipal elections in the city of Washington, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the expediency of providing for the engraving and publishing a map of the explorations of Lieutenant Warren, in Nebraska Territory, reported in favor of printing the map.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Ann Gratiot, widow of Charles Gratiot, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the petition of Andrew Chapman, son of George Chapman, a soldier in the Revolution, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; the petition of Elizabeth Uber, heir-at-law of Dorothy Wirt, widow of Ensign Philip Wirt, of the revolutionary army; the petition of Dolly Lincoln, Margaret Smith, and Linda Sexton, children of Noah Warriner, an officer of the Revolution, praying to be allowed the pension to which their father was entitled; the petition of Cynthia Bishop, daughter of Abram Foot, praying to be allowed the pension to which Captain Foot was entitled; the petition of James Hudgins, son of Ruth Murphy, late widow of John Hudgins; the petition of George Walters, son and heir-at-law of Michael Walters, praying to be allowed the pension to which his father was entitled; the petition of the heirs of Thomas Stevens, a revolutionary soldier, asking pay of pension due him in his life; the petition of the surviving children of Jerathmiel Doty, praying for the arrears of pension due him as an invalid pensioner; the petition of Deborah Burlingham, praying for a pension; and the petition of Charles F. Bruckner, administrator of William White, submitted an adverse report thereon, and reported a joint resolution (S. No. 45) inhibiting the payment of certain claims for pensions therein specified. The resolution was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 10) directing the Secretary of the Interior to pay certain pension claims therein specified, reported it without amendment, and submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom were referred the petition of the heirs and representatives of Christoval and Miguel De Armas; the petition of the heirs and legal representatives of James Johnson; a petition of citizens of New Orleans; and a petition of Joseph Keynes, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 410) to confirm certain land claims in the Florida parishes of Louisiana to the city of New Orleans and others. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 541) in relation to a railway along Pennsylvania avenue, in Washington city, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

JOHN ETHERIDGE.

Mr. IVERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the evidence in the case of John Etheridge be withdrawn from the Senate files and transmitted to the Court of Claims, to be used in the case of Hardin's administrator, now pending in said court.

POST ROUTES IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. SEBASTIAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing, by law, the following post routes in Arkansas, namely: from Lewisburg, in Conway county, by Galla Rock and Bates's mill, to Dardanel, in Yell county; from Mill Bayou to Chitticeaux, Missouri; from Augusta, in Jackson county, by Alvin McDonald, to Jackson Port; from Memphis, Tennessee, (by railroad), to Madison and Little Rock, in Arkansas; from Seary, in White county, to intersect the route from Desare to Port Smith, at Cadron creek; from Paraciffa, in Sevier county, to Sheetucket, in Polk county, and report by bill or otherwise.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY.

On motion of Mr. COLLAMER, the joint resolution (S. No. 44) to grant to the judges and solicitor of the Court of Claims the use of the Congressional Library, and for other purposes, was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the Speaker of the House had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Nancy Serena.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. PUGH, on his motion, was excused from further service on the Committee on the Judiciary.

INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. HUNTER. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a House joint resolution, (No. 32,) making appropriations to pay the expenses of the several investigating committees of the House of Representatives, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and to recommend its immediate passage. The House are anxious to get it passed at once, as there are some witnesses waiting for their compensation. I hope the joint resolution will be now considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

It appropriates $12,000 for the payment of expenses of the several investigating committees, and of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, which sum is to be added to the miscellaneous item of the contingent fund of the House.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE ASHLEY.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senate now to take up the motion to reconsider the vote taken the other day rejecting the bill (S. No. 89) for the relief of George Ashley, administrator de bonis non of Samuel Holgate, deceased. I only ask that the reconsideration may be agreed to so that the bill may go on the Calendar.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not ask for action on it now. Let it take the place on the Calendar to which it is entitled.

Mr. COLLAMER. It should be placed on the Calendar in the order in which it stood originally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be done.

N. C. TOWLE.

Mr. IVERSON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the sum of $321 be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to N. C. Towle, for his mileage and expenses in visiting the Aroostook country in Maine, under a resolution of the Senate of 18th August, 1856.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. IVERSON. I will state that Mr. Towle was sent by the Committee on Claims, under a resolution of the Senate of the 18th of August, 1856, to examine certain land titles in the State of Maine arising under the Ashburton treaty. He presented his account for expenses and mileage. That account was audited by the Committee on Claims Mr. Brodhead being then chairman, and signed by Messrs. Brodhead, Fessenden, Yulee, Geyer, Wade, and myself, "approved," and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, of which Judge Evans, the late Senator from South Carolina, was chairman. He allowed the account for $200, but did not allow the expenses of three dollars a day, and for hiring a horse and carriage, twenty-two dollars. It is unnecessary to refer the matter to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, because they have already acted on it, and rejected items to the amount of $121. It is very clear, it seems to me, that Mr. Towle is entitled to his expenses and mileage. That is all that has been charged; and it has been usual to allow it in such cases.

Mr. CLAY. Is this to pay him for his services?

Mr. IVERSON. There is nothing included in this account, I will say in response to the Senator from Alabama, for services. It is nothing but the mileage and actual expenditures, the expenses of eating and drinking, &c., and hiring a buggy or carriage to go up into that wild country where there was no facility of traveling, except by procuring a conveyance, which he had to hire and keep for several days. He charged nothing but the actual expenses which he paid out, and the mileage which has been usually allowed.

Mr. CLAY. What about the three dollars a day?

Mr. IVERSON. That is not allowed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first question is, is there unanimous consent to consider the resolution now, without reference to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate? The Chair hears no objection. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. YULEE. As I was one of the signers of the certificate approving the account of Mr. Towle, being then a member of the Committee on Claims, I will state that my understanding was, and is now, that the account was made out in precise conformity with the charges usually allowed to clerks of the Departments performing similar service.

Mr. IVERSON. That is so.

Mr. WRIGHT. This case, as I understand, was before the Committee on Contingent Expenses. This gentleman was a clerk to one of the committees of the Senate, and was receiving six or eight dollars a day as compensation for that service. The usage has been to allow ten cents a mile to persons employed as this gentleman was, to cover traveling expenses. The Committee on Contingent Expenses examined into it, and it appeared to them that that allowance ought to have been satisfactory. The expense of traveling perhaps was three cents a mile, but I think the committee allowed ten. The chairman of our committee supposed that that compensation was amply sufficient.

Mr. IVERSON. The chairman seems to have been laboring under a misapprehension, from the memorandum he left stating that a portion of this account was for services rendered. He has written here, "Dr. Towle was receiving six dollars a day as clerk to the Committee on Claims." The chairman was mistaken; no part of this account includes anything for services at all. It is simply to give him the mileage that is usually charged in such cases, and the actual amount paid out for his support and for hiring a buggy; that is all.

Mr. WRIGHT. There is certainly a mistake in regard to this case. Mr. Towle was receiving six dollars a day as clerk to the Committee on Claims while he was absent, and, in addition, received ten cents a mile for his traveling expenses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This resolution, making a charge on the contingent fund, must have three readings.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move to refer it to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection may be made to the second reading of the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope my friend from Arkansas will not make the objection. The last Committee on Claims knew all about it. It has been once there; and the Senate may dispense with the necessity of sending it there again.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I shall not make the motion.

The resolution was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not understand how it is that we are to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate for information in relation to the Aroostook country. Who sent him? What was his authority?

Mr. IVERSON. He was sent under a resolution of the Senate of the 18th of August, 1856, authorizing and instructing the Committee on Claims to send an agent for the purpose of making certain investigations. There is a claim now—a very large claim—pending against the United States for the value of this property; and he was sent there, as a protection to the United States, to examine the value of it, and report. He performed very valuable and somewhat arduous service.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to me it ought not to come out of the contingent fund. It is a matter affecting the general interest of the United States, and belongs to an appropriation bill. It is not proper that we should institute such commissions, and pay for them out of the contingent fund.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The facts in this case are very simple, and I have been surprised that there should be the slightest objection in the world to the claim as made. The claimant was and is the clerk of the Senate Committee on Claims. Before that committee was a very considerable claim involving some fifty or sixty thousand dollars, as it turned out, on the part of different people in the State of Maine, on account of lands which they had lost under the treaty of Washington. One principal difficulty and a probability of great expense arose from the reason that they were all small claims, and all involved questions of title, which questions of title were to be examined and considered. In the Committee on Claims that difficulty occurred, and the then chairman, I think, or some one of the committee—I do not know who it was, at any rate it did not come from the clerk of the committee—proposed that we should get leave to send somebody there in the recess to take proof of those titles. The Senate accordingly passed an order to that effect, that the Committee on Claims be authorized to send an agent in the recess for the purpose of taking this testimony.

After this resolution passed, and it came to be discussed who should be the individual sent, it was suggested that we had better send our own clerk, because we could rely on what he would do under the direction of the committee. Accordingly in the recess he went, and he was gone for some five or six weeks. I know enough of the country to know what he had to do. He had to travel for a large distance through a country where there is no railroad, no stage-coach; where he must get along by private conveyance, as he could, and sleep in cabins. They are all settlements in the woods, far up on the line; and he must necessarily have had a very hard time of it. He came back, drew out a very lengthy and correct report of his transactions; and on that report a bill was founded, which passed the committee unanimously, and again passed the committee unanimously at this session, and has been passed also by the committee of the House, but has not yet become a law. For all these services which he thus rendered in connection with that matter, all the claim he made was three dollars a day for actual expenses, which certainly would not more than cover them, and the ordinary mileage of ten cents allowed to an officer for traveling for a public purpose; and that claim is that which is presented, amounting, for the whole expenses, to something over three hundred dollars. He ought to have charged more, according to the system which prevails here; certainly much more. If he had charged $500, instead of $300, I suppose the result would have been that everybody would be satisfied with the striking off of $150, and giving him more than he claims now; but being an honest man, and traveling under these circumstances, performing that service, he makes this charge. No reasonable man, it strikes me, can object to it.

The resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. POLK. I wish to understand if the resolution has been reported against by the committee to whom it was referred?

Mr. FESSENDEN. There has never been any report at all on the subject.

Mr. POLK. I wish to understand the matter. The Senator from New Jersey was making some remarks on it when I came in.

Mr. IVERSON. I will state, for the benefit of the Senator from Missouri, that this account was referred at the last session to the Committee on Contingent Expenses; and Judge Evans made the following indorsement on the papers:

"Mr. Towle was, at the time he performed the service, clerk of the Committee on Claims, receiving an actual salary of six dollars a day, and therefore no part of this account can be allowed except for expenses actually incurred, of which he must return an account."

"JOSIAH J. EVANS."

This is for the expenses; no part of it is for salary or services.

Mr. POLK. What I wish to get at is this: whether any committee has inquired to ascertain whether the actual expenses are in amount what is now proposed to be paid by the resolution? for, whatever the actual expenses are, I am ready and willing to vote the payment of them; but I wish to know that they are actual expenses.

Mr. IVERSON. I will say, in response, that the account, as made out by Mr. Towle, was presented to the Committee on Claims at the last Congress, and examined and allowed by them, and signed by Mr. Brodhead, the chairman, and every member of the committee.

Mr. POLK. And the amount proposed to be paid is that which was allowed?

Mr. IVERSON. Exactly.

Mr. POLK. That is satisfactory.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to state, for the information of the Senator from Missouri, that this claim was before the Committee on Contingent Expenses, and the committee unanimously agreed to allow ten cents a mile, which they thought was ample compensation. That amounted to over two hundred dollars. This gentleman, during that time, was receiving his pay as clerk of the Committee on Claims; and for this service, which was a mere pleasure trip to the North, we proposed to allow him ten cents a mile, which we deemed amply sufficient.

Mr. POLK. Has he received ten cents a mile in addition to what is now proposed? ["No! no!"]

Mr. IVERSON. He has not received as yet one cent; but the $200 for mileage is charged to this account, and forms a part of it. The balance of $120 is his bill for expenses, and the hiring of a buggy.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have said the committee proposed to allow ten cents a mile, which we considered sufficient for the services. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution cannot be read a third time to-day, objection being made.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 341) making appropriations for repairing and securing the works of the harbor of Chicago, Illinois.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TOOMBS. When I was cut off by the termination of the morning hour yesterday, I had nearly concluded the very brief reply I was making to the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] and the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN.] I was replying to the position which was assumed by those gentlemen, that on account of the difficulty of apportioning taxation, and particularly the expense of an improvement of this kind, it was best to put it upon the whole people of the United States, by taking it out of the general fund. The honorable Senator from Vermont seemed to consider that the citizens of Vermont would be compensated by the benefit resulting to the general commerce of the country. I wish, in a very few words, to show that Senator that the very same injustice exists that would exist under other circumstances. The cotton-planter on the Mississippi river, who gets his cotton freighted to New Orleans at a less price, by reason of removing the snags and removing the bars, and cheapening the transportation, gets as much of that general advantage as the wool-grower in Vermont; and, besides that, he has all the special advantage. That argument of general advantage, then, amounts to nothing. He is putting his burdens, his special burdens, on the general fund, and equally participating in all the results of the consequential benefits of the general commerce of the country. So the inequality is precisely the same; that argument does not remove the inequality. The same injustice is done to his constituents by cheapening the transportation of my cotton in the one case as in the other, because if I paid the expense of cheapening the transportation myself I should get the general benefits resulting to the commerce of the country, and so would the man in Vermont. If I can throw it on him and the rest of society, I participate as much in the general prosperity as he does; and, besides that, I reap all the special advantage, and so the injustice is as much in the one case as in the other. Instead of this idea of the nationality of a work being a reason for throwing it on the common fund, it is a reason against it, on all principles of justice and equality. If there are a great number of people directly benefited, so much the less the burden on them to make the improvement, so much the harder to put it on others.

Take the case I put yesterday. Take the man in Vermont, who has even no imperfect natural way of transporting his commodities to market; he makes an artificial one. Why should not the Government help him to do it? If the Government makes a railroad to Vermont or Georgia, it enables the planters to grow what they could not grow before, and to transport to market what they do grow at a less price than they did before, by the whole difference between the cost of transportation on an ordinary road and a railroad and the saving of time. Then there is as much public advantage in the Government building a railroad in Vermont as clearing out the Mississippi, and that same advantage is spread over the country in the same way. Why, then, should it not build a railroad? Why, instead of doing that, should it put a burden on Vermont railroads to the whole extent of the duty on railroad iron, and upon Georgia railroads, and take that identical money and use it to remove obstructions from the Mississippi river? I think there is nothing in the condition of the two sections of the country that would warrant it. It is unjust to Vermont; it is unjust to Georgia; it is unjust to the people on the Mississippi who do not use the river. It is true, they may get a portion of the general advantage that results to the commerce of the country; but so does the man whose tolls are paid from the public Treasury; and, besides that, he gets the specific advantage of cheapening his own bales of cotton or hogshead of sugar. Hence the

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, MAY 27, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 151.

Senator will perceive that the argument does not meet the objection of inequality. I proceed on the great principle that equality is equity, and that all burdens should be apportioned to those who get the benefits of them wherever it can be done. It will not do to say that you will assume a burden on particular individuals out of the public Treasury because all the citizens of the United States are incidentally benefited by the improvement of the commerce of the country. It is wrong in principle; it is unjust.

The Senator from Vermont attempted to illustrate it by the case of the rents in New York. He said that a tax on the real estate in New York would fall on the tenant. It is very much more just that it should fall on the tenant than in any other case; but I will say it does not necessarily. It is much more just, according to principle, that it should fall on the tenant in New York, than that the cost of the transportation of a hoghead of sugar on the Mississippi river should be borne by the people of Vermont. The tax put upon the house in New York increases its price. It is an element of its cost, and therefore necessarily the owner of the house would put it upon the tenant if he could; but if it so turns out that there are a hundred houses to be had in that locality, and but fifty people who want to rent them, that element of cost may be lost, just as much as the cost of the labor or the materials that built it, or the land it is put on. The tax is an element of price, but it may be lost, on account of the controlling influence of other elements of price. An equal, if not a much greater, element of price than all these put together, consists in the demand and supply. If there is a deficiency of tenants and an overplus of houses, the whole effect of all these elements of price may be lost, so that the tenant may not pay a dime of the tax, but the landlord will have to pay it all.

Mr. COLLAMER. He may not have a tenant. Mr. TOOMBS. If he does not, of course he has to pay the tax himself. If there were a hundred houses to rent, and but fifty tenants, of course a tenant would get a house for much less money than if the converse were true, because the great, the controlling element of price is the demand and supply everywhere. That would come in to disturb the rents. If there were one hundred tenants and only fifty houses, then the landlord would get the tax from the tenant, and get a still higher interest on his capital. It is more just that the tenant should pay it, because it is an element in the cost of the tenement that shelters his head; but it would not be fair to put it on the Vermont wool-grower and the Louisiana sugar man, on the ground of general benefit. I say, then, the illustration will not answer, even if it were apposite to the particular case.

The honorable Senator from Louisiana, admitting the abstract justice of the principle for which I contend, says there are difficulties in carrying it out. He says that some of the boats are larger than others; that some make voyages for longer distances on the river than others; and he desires to know whether you would tax them according to the tonnage, or according to the trips. I take it, it would be very much like a toll-bridge or a canal. Every difficulty which he suggested is met and overcome by New York on her canal. They travel that canal with different-sized boats, they travel different distances, and some more and some less frequently; but when the State of New York, in pursuance of the great principle of justice for which I am contending, determined to tax those who used it to reimburse the public for constructing it, she found a way to distribute the burden among them—at least by an approximation to justice, if she could not attain exact justice in all cases. I know no reason why you could not as readily tax tonnage on products on the Mississippi river from St. Louis to New Orleans, as New York can from Albany to Buffalo on the Erie canal. Every one of the difficulties which the Senator from Louisiana suggested in regard to the Mississippi river, exists with regard to the Erie canal. There is no more difficulty in apportioning these rates on an artificial than on a natural highway.

The honorable Senator from Mississippi suggested that the lower Mississippi was a good river, and that it would be hard to tax the commerce of that portion of the river which did not need improvement for the benefit of other portions. The reply to that is, that if that portion of the river did not need improvement, there would be no application to levy tonnage duties there. I do not propose to make any State lay tonnage duties for improvement purposes, but I propose, as I am authorized to do under the Constitution of the United States, to allow a State to tax tonnage, if she pleases, for the purpose of improving her ports and her rivers. If Louisiana does not want to exercise the power, I do not wish to make her do it; and that is a sufficient answer to this point. Above Louisiana, Arkansas, Tennessee, and Missouri may want the power to improve the river through their States, and, if so, I would grant it to them, but I would not force it on anybody. If they are content with their river, if they are unwilling to take these risks, or if they think the cost of removing the bars or snags, or whatever obstructions there may be in that noble river, is not justified by the benefit to them, they will not ask for the power, and I am willing to let them have it as it is; but if they desire to improve their river, by taxing their own commerce, if they think the benefits to themselves and to the commerce of the country will be greater than the cost of the improvement, I will allow them to do it out of their own money, but not out of mine. The reason why the persons who have favored this class of improvements at the general expense will not accept my proposition, the reason why some of the States have abandoned the tonnage duty is because they preferred to levy the money out of the general fund rather than out of their own pockets. Baltimore gave it up; Savannah gave it up; for they preferred the United States should do it. Why? Because then they would pay in a dime and take out a guinea. There is not a man in the United States, there is not a free negro, North or South, who does not understand that game. The argument of general benefit which is made use of, does not deceive anybody. It does not deceive the people who make it. It is admitted that when the Government does such work, it does it worse than private individuals. The honorable Senator from Illinois, who temporarily supports this system until, as he says, he can get a better one, has said on this floor, that ninety-nine dollars out of every hundred spent by this Government for these purposes, have been sunk and squandered, and, on the whole, have done the rivers more harm than good. Everybody knows that the Government does work of this kind worse than individuals; everybody knows that it does it more expensively; everybody knows it brings less skill and judgment and talent than individuals to it. I believe there is not a company in the United States that wants to clear out a harbor or construct a railroad that would take a Government engineer if you gave him to them. My State once tried one of the chiefs of the topographical engineers, but she found out her error to her cost, and discharged him. People who spend their money in public works, get an engineer who understands his business. They do not come to the Government for him.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senator is mistaken in the fact. The calls were so frequent, and the detention of the officers so long, that it had to be prohibited. One of the great works which was achieved in Michigan, leaving a surplus on hand, was done under the direction of an officer of the topographical engineers; and, it was supposed, could not have been done otherwise.

Mr. TOOMBS. We tried Colonel Long, of the topographical engineers in Georgia, and our experience was different. As far as my observation has extended, although some people may try them as we did once or twice, yet, as a class, they are the least efficient engineers of any in the United States. If it were not so, would they remain in the public service at the very small amount of compensation, of which they are continually complaining? Men in civil life get their five, their ten, their fifteen, or their twenty thousand dollars a year to engineer railroads; and yet these men hang on and come here and beg for an increase of salaries—fifteen hundred, or two thousand, or three thousand dollars a year. That is a demonstration in my judgment.

Mr. DAVIS. I must correct the Senator again, if he will permit me to do so. These engineers are not persons who come here and beg for additional salary more than anybody else connected with the Government. I will also inform him that some of the very engineers who in civil employment are receiving such high salaries, have been drawn from the Army, from the fact that they could not get as much from the Government as from private individuals.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is what I supposed—those of them who are good for anything have quit the service.

Mr. DAVIS. Not at all.

Mr. TOOMBS. I should suppose that would be the general rule, but I am not as well acquainted with them as the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. DAVIS. I will interrupt the Senator once more, merely to say that his supposition is entirely unfounded in the character of these officers. Professional zeal, attachment to the Army in which they have been bred, bind men of the highest character and attainment to it; and they should certainly be exempt from such a reflection as to put them in the mere mercenary class of remaining in the service because they cannot go elsewhere. There are many cases where they are offered the most tempting prices to leave the service, but remain on account of their attachment to it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am quite satisfied that the honorable Senator, probably from his own esprit du corps, gives them credit for very different motives from those upon which they act. I judge them as other men, and I do not consider it dishonorable to them.

Mr. HAYNE. I would say to the honorable Senator from Georgia, with his permission, that I have passed almost my whole life in the Army, and I think what I say on this point may be relied upon. I know these gentlemen have received the best education in the country—a West Point education—and they are men of the highest principle and truthfulness. I cannot think that those engineers who prepare themselves temporarily for such service can rank on a footing with those educated as I have stated.

Mr. TOOMBS. The public judgment is against the honorable Senator from South Carolina, and my own is unshaken by the statement. I know that when individuals have their capital and interest at stake they employ the men who can do their work best, and they do not select your topographical engineers for service of this kind. I would say to the Senator from Mississippi, that I know those persons have applied from time to time for an increase of pay. The pay of the engineer corps and of the Army was raised while that honorable Senator was at the head of the War Office. It was done by Congress, it is true, but the solicitations were great from all quarters—well known to me. So far as their education at West Point is concerned, that is no argument with me; I think very little of it. I think it is an exceedingly defective education; and one of the reasons why they are not fit for this service results from their education, isolated from the community. They are not fit to construct or to carry on these improvements. To do so, they ought to know the price of turnips, of wheat, of corn, of beef, of pork, of labor at every point—the hire of slaves or freemen; they should understand the whole business of life. I know that in some instances where we employed those officers we paid for it at our terrible cost. That is the history of my own State, and I know it is so in other States of the Union. No doubt men educated at West Point may be distinguished, but men may be distinguished in this particular department and not be educated at all; they may have picked up their knowledge for themselves in after life. Some of the most eminent and successful engineers in the world have been of that class. What was the elder Stephenson, who invented the steam rail car, but a laborer in a workshop? He had no education of any sort; and in my opinion, the very education and pursuits of these officers disable them from the great business of carrying on the improvement of a river or a road; and my observation has been; that whenever they have been sent to works of this kind, they have spent twice, and sometimes three or four times the money that private individuals would do for the same service, without the same benefit. I was giving the testimony of one of the supporters of these measures, the honorable Senator from Illinois, in remarks which he made here at the last Congress, that ninety per cent. of your appropriations was squandered by these officers, and the appropriations had turned out to be worse than useless. There is a case in North Carolina where hundreds of thousands of dollars were expended under their direction to improve a river; and after having done that, North Carolina called on us for hundreds of thousands of dollars more to repair their blunders, and remedy the injury they had done to Cape Fear river. We passed a bill for that purpose at the last Congress. Their whole path is strewn with failures; that is their history.

I was saying that everybody knows that the Government does the business more expensively than individuals. That is my opinion, and I believe it is the general opinion. Not only that, but the Government does it worse than individuals. Then why do they come here and ask the Government to do it? Simply because they are not interested in the expenditure; it is not their money. People who spend their own money are careful about the agencies to whom they intrust it; but those who spend other people's money are indifferent as to the agencies by which it is done. These are sound principles, which everybody, I presume, will understand. The reason why they come to the Government is not that the Government will do it better, for experience shows that it does it worse. It is not that the Government will do it more economically and skillfully, but it is because it is done with the money of others, not their own. Look at the enormous appropriations asked this year for the simplest work which is made by these engineers. They are continually on the lakes, and continually making estimates. Of course they are not to blame for it; the Government sends them there; but it is a legitimate argument with me, according to the facts of the case, that the Government does it worse than anybody else, and always has.

Mr. DAVIS. I will not interrupt the Senator if it be at all disagreeable to him.

Mr. TOOMBS. It is not.

Mr. DAVIS. But as he seems about to pass from that point, I wish to make a correction. Without specifying any case himself, he refers to the Senator from Illinois, who, I think, somewhat injudiciously did instance a case—the constructions on the Ohio river. Those constructions, so far from having been made by officers of the Army, topographical or other engineers, were constructions which had been made exactly upon the same idea the Senator now announces, that men without education could be got to do the work better than those who had learned something, and so they got a steamboat man to build a dam at Cumberland Island, and that dam was one of the very cases the Senator from Illinois rested his accusation on. It was not constructed by the United States engineers, and they would never have put it there. I know no improvements which justify the charge that the Senator from Georgia has been making, unless he goes back to a remote period, when some wing walls were built on the upper Ohio. They were injudiciously built by an Army engineer, but there is not an Army engineer now who would attempt to advocate them. I think their expenses have been lower than they would have been if they were turned over to contractors or to men having an interest. They have stood as the defenders of the Government against private interest, and their permanent connection with the Government naturally made them so. I do not think general accusations should be made against them. If there be any particular case I will meet it, if I have the knowledge now to answer any accusation.

Mr. TOOMBS. It seems that these gentlemen are very tenacious on the point of defending the engineer corps. I was only illustrating a general principle from known facts. I am willing to leave the question to the entire country. Let it pass as my opinion, that they are the least competent and most expensive of all persons for this kind of work. That is my judgment; and I leave the argument with the country. The case I gave was the Cape Fear river; one within my own knowledge. Another case was the discharge, by my own State, of a colonel of engineers, because he was inefficient and very expensive.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I will answer to the first, as that is specific; and I do not know, on the second, to what the Senator refers. The application which was made for an appropriation to improve the navigation of the Cape Fear river was not on account of bad work done on that river. It was said to be the consequence of a fortification built outside of the Cape Fear river; that a fortification built to defend the entrance into Cape Fear had, by the attrition of the bank, formed a bar at the mouth of Cape Fear river, and thus affected the navigation. I did not believe it at the time, and I do not believe it now.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator is wholly mistaken as to the reasons given for that measure. Mr. Badger, the then Senator from North Carolina, put it expressly upon the ground that the Government had injured the river by the injudicious building of dams; and it went through this body on that ground.

Mr. DAVIS. It was a fort outside of the mouth of the river. It is matter of report; the whole case is spread upon the record.

Mr. TOOMBS. I understand the matter perfectly well; I know the locality. Some of those wings are more than five miles from the fort that was being repaired. I know the locality; I have passed by it fifty times.

Mr. DAVIS. Were any of them in the river?

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir; in Cape Fear river.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will state the facts as I have always understood them. After the fort was built, fearing that perhaps it might be injured by the current of the river, or some other cause, a sort of dam or jetty was made out, to throw the current off. That was supposed to have thrown the water on the other side, and washed away the opposite bank, and made the river perhaps half a mile or a mile wider, spread it out, and produced shoal water. The late efforts of the Government, therefore, have been to narrow the river again by stopping the new inlet, and by throwing the current back where it originally was; and it has been stated again and again that this accident would not have occurred, but for the work of which I have spoken, to protect the fort, which threw the current off. That is my impression about the occurrence.

Mr. TOOMBS. There are many instances to which I might allude, if the Senator from Mississippi insisted on specific instances. The bill for the improvement of Cape Fear river was introduced here, and argued as an exceptional case upon the ground that the object was to repair a damage done by bad engineering of the Government. It passed Congress on the ground that the injury to the river was the act of the Government; and the object was to remove what it had done, which had injured, instead of benefited, the navigation; and I believe the bill was signed by the President for that reason.

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer the Senator if he will permit me.

Mr. TOOMBS. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. It was considered by the President, upon the terms used in the law, that Congress had decided that the bar formed at the mouth of Cape Fear river was the consequence of the action of the Government. It was not bad engineering; there was nothing said about engineering. It was presented, however, as the consequence of the action of the Government in the law; and that action of the Government was, in the opinion of Congress, I suppose, the construction of the fort and the wall or jetty, which was thrown out from the fort to protect the island on which the fort was built. That was outside of the Cape Fear river. That jetty is claimed, as the Senator from North Carolina has stated, to have deflected the current, and caused shoal water. I know of no work which was done in the river; it was not good engineering nor bad engineering for the improvement of the river. The engineering was the construction of the fort. That construction I believe to have been well done. I did not believe, and I do not believe now, what is asserted in the law, that the attrition of the point and the formation of the bar were at all attributable to the construction of the fort.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not see that the facts with which I set out have been in the slightest degree altered by these interruptions. The people of North Carolina came here and said the Government, by its works in Cape Fear river, below the port of Wilmington, had injured the river, and they asked the Government to remove them. That was my general idea about it, and I knew it was made an exceptional case. I was speaking from memory in regard to it. It was so far exceptional, that Mr. Pierce, who vetoed all appropriations for the removal of natural obstructions as unconstitutional, for which I very highly commended him, approved that bill for the reason that it was stated in the law to be for repairing damages done by the Government.

Mr. DAVIS. That case and the Savannah river constitute two exceptions.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Savannah river was excepted on another ground. It was on account of vessels sunk there by the defenders of Savannah, to prevent the coming up of the troops. The Cape Fear bill was put on the ground that it was to remove damages done by the Government. I do not think there is any principle of patriotism which ought to call on any man, especially a topographical engineer, to serve the Government for $1,500 a year if he is worth $10,000. I do not think it is any want of patriotism to quit the service, or any patriotism to adhere to it, under such circumstances. I consider that a man does either the one or the other according to his tastes, and according to the advantage to himself; and there are a thousand incidents of life which affect it. Nobody, I apprehend, with my opinions of these officers, would ever employ one of them to dig a ditch, unless he knew him very well. Of course, particular individuals may be well educated and fit for the work; but to take them at hazard, because they came from West Point, would be no recommendation to me. I should want to know that this man had skill, and the other faculties necessary for such service. The simple fact that he belonged to the United States engineer corps would be no recommendation; for, as I have said, in my State our experience of them has been disastrous.

When these interruptions occurred in regard to the engineer corps, I had nearly concluded what I had to say, and I should not have occupied five minutes longer if I had been permitted to proceed. I stated my own judgment of these officers from rather limited experience, I admit; but I referred to the authority of the Senator from Illinois, and I will correct the Senator from Mississippi in regard to that. The Senator from Illinois not only referred to the case alluded to by the Senator from Mississippi, but he stated that he had been a quarter of a century in the West; he had voted for these improvements; he knew them; and his judgment upon all of them was what I have stated. I recollect his remarks well. That was one of the cases he cited.

Mr. DAVIS. I read his remarks, and he was so unfortunate, I thought, as to cite a case where the facts did not sustain him. Of course, all the cases which were outside of that, and which were generally stated, it was not in the power of any one to answer.

Mr. TOOMBS. I did not attempt to answer them. I was citing his declaration as coming from a defender of this system. I leave the point to the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Illinois to settle between themselves. I state it as the argument of a Senator on this floor, and the record sustains me in it.

I say then, this work ought not to be done by the Government, because it is worse done, and more expensively done, than by individuals. It ought not to be done, because it takes the money of all the people of the United States, and appropriates it to local improvements. On all points, constitutionality, expediency, and justice, this system ought to be opposed, and it is supported for the sole reason that particular localities desire other people's money to make improvements to benefit themselves.

Mr. CLAY. I do not propose to enter into the discussion of these incidental questions of constitutional law and political economy which have been raised by the Senators from Mississippi and Georgia; but I wish before the vote is taken upon this bill to advertise the country of two facts which have not been much adverted to—one of which, in fact, has not been alluded to. One is that by the testimony of the advocates of the system, and the especial advocate of this particular appropriation, the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] this work is an interminable one, and in the next place, that it is a wholly useless one. I quoted from memory the other day, the remarks of the Senator from Illinois, as to the fact that this appropriation must be annual in order to be efficient; that the currents of the lake would destroy annually the improvements that were made, in a greater or less degree, and hence they must be continued forever. I wish it understood that this is a Sisyphean labor; that we must continue from year to year to make appropriations for the improvement of this harbor if we intend to preserve it; and as to perfecting or completing it, that is all a delusion. The Senator from Illinois does not contend that it can ever be completed; but, if what he alleged when this proposition was before the Senate in a different form, proposing a larger appropriation, some two years since, be true, this appropriation is wholly useless. At that time we proposed to appropriate $50,000. The sum asked by the topographical engineers who surveyed the work, was $138,000. The Senator from Illinois moved to amend the bill at that time by striking out $50,000, and inserting the amount estimated by the engineer, $138,516, and he said:

"From this estimate and report it appears that, for the completion of the Chicago harbor, according to the opinion of the engineer corps, $138,516 68 is the sum required. Now, when your engineers give an estimate for a specific work, it is very bad economy to appropriate half what is necessary, for it will cost you twice as much to perform the service in that way as by appropriating at once what is required. You must expend the same amount in machinery, in labor, in superintendence, and in everything that constitutes the extras of the work, under a small appropriation as under a large one; and it is the cheapest to appropriate at once the sum that you require, or else make no appropriation at all."

"I can only say, that if it is proposed to make appropriations for the improvement of harbors, economy requires us to make appropriations to the extent that is necessary, in order to obtain the greatest amount of benefit in the construction of the works."

"It seems that when the estimate came, it was for $138,000; and the committee indorsed it. Then should you put the appropriation at $50,000, without any assurance that the money will not give out before the work is in such a state of forwardness as to protect it against storms? When the storms come, your $50,000 may be a total loss. True economy is to give whatever is necessary at once, and let the work be finished."

The testimony of the Senator, who resides there, and who speaks, I suppose, from ocular observation and experience, is, that unless you made the entire appropriation of $138,000, (the sum required two years ago by the engineers,) you might as well throw into the river the $80,000 now proposed to be expended. It is so much money thrown away; and he says you must appropriate all in order to secure the work, or none at all. By his own testimony, it is better that we should make no appropriation unless we appropriate the entire sum required by the engineers. I do not doubt that he is correct. I know that he is sustained by the testimony of the topographical engineers; for time and again they have said to me—and I think I can find even in some of their reports—that one reason why they have come so often for these appropriations, and why the sum has been annually increasing from year to year, is that Congress will not appropriate all they require at one time.

Mr. POLK. I wish to ask the Senator a question: whether the amount that is named in the bill is less than the engineers state to be necessary, or whether it is the exact sum?

Mr. CLAY. I will state to the Senator that the sum they asked to complete the improvement of the harbor two years ago was $138,000. At this time, in reply to a letter addressed by me as chairman of the Committee on Commerce to the War Department, asking what sums were necessary in order to preserve the works and to prevent their decay and destruction, they responded $80,000; and the bill proposes to give $80,000. But then I show, by the testimony of the Senator from Illinois and the testimony of the engineers themselves, that it is an injudicious appropriation. They say it is useless to make the appropriation unless we give all they demand.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Alabama is under a misapprehension in regard to the statement of facts to which his remarks apply now, in the comparison between the present appropriation and the one proposed two years ago. That appropriation was for the extension of the pier further into the lake, as an addition to the harbor, and it was estimated that it would require so much money to extend and enlarge it. The necessity for that extension arises from this fact; there is a current in Lake Michigan from the north to the south, sweeping along the shore, freighted with sands, and it gathers them on the shore, carrying them southward. Hence when you make a pier into the lake obstructing the current, the sand as it strikes the pier deposits and keeps forming land on the north side of the pier; and as the water deposits the sand there the current washes away on the south side. That process has formed over one hundred acres of land on the north side of the Chicago pier by this regular accretion, and as that forms until it gets further and further into the lake, it will sweep around the point at the end of the pier, and then fill up the channel of the river. Then it is necessary to elongate that pier further; but after a while land begins to form at the end of the pier, and sand floats around and closes the harbor again. The process of the elongation of the pier from time to time to avoid this accumulation has gone on from the beginning of the harbor, and in my opinion will have to go on in all time to come. That is my impression.

The appropriation proposed two years ago was to elongate the pier further into the lake. I said it was useless to begin a pier unless you finished it; because, unless you closed it and made the abutment across the end and fastened it, the first storm that came would take it away. For this reason you must go on and complete your pier, and make it firm as far as you go. It was on the bill for the elongation of the pier that I made the remarks of which the gentleman from Alabama speaks.

This year, as I understand, in consideration of the deficit in the Treasury and the necessity of resorting to loans, growing out of the extraordinary embarrassment and pressure of the times, the Committee on Commerce have concluded to omit appropriations for the enlargement of harbors, or for the construction of new works, and to confine the appropriations to the repairing of that which has been heretofore done and is going to decay, to preserve it from destruction. Hence the appropriation provided for in this bill applies entirely to a different object from the one proposed by the bill two years ago. This is to apply to the securing of the old pier. I will explain to the Senate that the old pier was made by cribs of wood filled with stone. These wooden cribs have decayed until they are falling to pieces, and the stones are tumbling away and washing into the channel, and this is only to replace them with sound timber, and to put back the stones that have washed away, and prevent others from washing off. It is, in other words, a reconstruction of the wood work and part of the stone work of the old pier, and not an elongation of it by making a new addition to it. The one is for repair and preservation, the other was for a continuation of the harbor. Therefore, the remarks which I made two years ago on that proposition, although they seem to the Senator from Alabama to be applicable to the present bill, do not reach this question.

While I am up, I will make a remark on another point. I stated, on Monday, that my opinion was, that, in consequence of the action of the water, this constant current, of which I have spoken, from the north freighted with sand, depositing it against the north side of the pier, would require the pier to be elongated, from time to time, forever. The Senator from Mississippi expresses the same idea, that it would require, from time to time, additions into the lake. A very intelligent citizen of Chicago, one of the oldest settlers there, called on me yesterday, and stated that he had heard my remarks, and he thought I had fallen into an error on one point, and I feel it just to myself and to him to correct that error.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to appeal to him? There are twenty of these bills, and certainly each of us might present the merits of all our particular claims. They are all behind this. I think that those who will vote for this bill for the improvement of Chicago harbor, are prepared to vote for it, and I am quite sure that not one more will vote for it if the Senator shows it to be any more just, or right, or reasonable. I appeal to him, therefore, to let us take the question. In half an hour we shall be cut off from the consideration of the subject.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I regret that the Senator from New York deemed it to be his duty to interrupt me, for the reason that I should have been through in half the time he has occupied, if he had not done so. I was simply making this correction. The gentleman to whom I have alluded stated that the engineer there had discovered a mode by which he could prevent this accumulation, by a cross pier, for a short distance, in the form of a breakwater. If that be true, if Captain Webster, whom the Senator from Mississippi knows, and Colonel Graham, have made a discovery by which that process of constant accretion will stop, then my remark, that it will require a continual appropriation for all time to come, was erroneous.

Mr. DAVIS. You do not understand the process.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understand it is by making a breakwater in a semicircular form just off the end of the pier, which will shoot the water through without filling up the channel or depositing the sand there. That is the explanation made to me. If that be so, they have remedied a great evil which I was fearful never would be remedied; and I make this correction, so far as it is a correction, in justice to the subject, in order that I may not mislead the Senate.

Mr. CLAY. If the Senator from Illinois was right in August, 1856, he is certainly wrong now. He then maintained that we must appropriate $138,000 to complete the harbor, for that was the language of the bill, and that less than that sum would be useless. I do not think he has shown any reason to justify his change of opinion to-day. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DIXON. I have paired off with the Senator from Alabama, Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator from Florida, Mr. YULEE, was called out for a short time, and I agreed to pair off with him.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Doollittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Jones, Kennedy, King, Seward, Shields, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Reid, Sidel, Toombs, and Wright—17.

So the bill was passed.

HARBOR OF MILWAUKEE.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 342) making appropriations for the preservation and repair of the piers at the mouth of Milwaukee river, Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $28,630 for the purpose indicated in its title.

Mr. POLK. I should like some Senator who knows what the work is to which this expenditure is to be applied, to explain it; for I certainly, from the reports that have been laid before the Senate, labored under a mistake in regard to Chicago harbor. I want to know whether it is to secure a work that has been in process of construction on appropriations heretofore made, or whether it is to build up decays that have taken place in a work that was made years ago.

Mr. SEWARD. The honorable Senator from Missouri will excuse me if I state to him generally that every one of these bills is based upon estimates necessary for the preservation of existing works; not for enlarging, or continuing, or renewing any of them; but in this particular case, if he will return to the report from the topographical department, on page 68 he will find this statement:

"In order to the timely operations necessary to save this harbor, I would recommend the granting of the above amount in one appropriation."

Mr. CLAY. I hold the estimates in my hand. There was no report made, but here are the "estimates of the funds deemed absolutely necessary to preserve existing works for the improvement of harbors and rivers under the charge of the bureau of topographical engineers;" and in respect to this it simply says:

"For the preservation and repair of the piers at the mouth of Milwaukee river, Wisconsin, $28,630."

Mr. POLK. Can the Senator inform me when these piers were made, whether they are piers in process of construction, or whether they have been finished some time and now need repairs?

Mr. TOOMBS. I can inform the Senator, having looked through a number of these cases in committee, that these words "preservation and repair" are merely delusive. They are a mere pretext. Until this year we had bills for continuing the works. I think if you will look at the record, you will find that there were some sixty appropriation bills of this class passed at the last Congress by the Senate; and at least nineteen out of twenty were for continuing harbors; and, as was said about Chicago, the appropriations are to continue forever. As to the necessity, of course your engineers will report that something is necessary to be done. If you send a carpenter or an engineer to look out for something to be done, he will find something to do. I recollect that one of the Senators from California stated that they wanted a survey on the Pacific coast, because there were works very necessary to their commerce; but, inasmuch as you had not done anything there heretofore, you will not do anything now. But, as to its being necessary to keep the storms from destroying what has been done, in my judgment there is not such a case in the whole batch.

Mr. POLK. I will ask the Senator from Georgia if this is a case in which, with appropriations heretofore made, the Government of the United States has progressed and expended large amounts, leaving the work uncompleted, and there is required another appropriation of a small amount for the purpose of perfecting that work thus imperfectly carried forward, not finished, going to decay? I understand it is not such a case.

Mr. TOOMBS. In my opinion, there is no such case; but they are all put upon that ground, every one of them. For instance, take the St. Clair flats. They go on and say, that with a few more dredge boats, and by a little more dredging and clearing out the mud of the river, it will stick this time; the same wave that put the mud there will stop putting the mud there again; and hence, you must preserve what has been done by going on and dredging some more! Look at the report of the engineer, and you will find that is the case he makes. When you have gone on and dredged out a certain depth and a certain width on the St. Clair flats, you are to go on and take out some more mud. The appropriation is for some more dredging-boats for excavating more earth; and, if they can do more of it, then they say that will preserve what they have already done?

Mr. BIGLER. I desire to submit a remark or two in explanation of the vote I cast a few minutes since, and of the votes I may give on this general subject. As a member of the Committee on Commerce, I felt disposed to favor such appropriations as were absolutely necessary to preserve a work which had been constructed, and which, in the opinion of the Department, might lead rapidly to decay without repairing such parts as might be injured by the action of the water or other causes. But, sir, I have no inclination to vote for a new work of this kind, or for the extension of a work which has been begun, in the present condition of our finances. I voted for the repairs of the piers at Chicago, because I believed it to be among the class of improvements which we ought to protect. I said in committee, and I say now, that I do not know that improvements like the St. Clair flats or the Red river, where the process is dredging, and dredging constantly, yearly and interminably, ought to be ranked with those of superstructures, such as piers and works which have a distinct existence. Now, sir, I did not vote to report the bill for the improvement of the Red river, on this ground; it is not a repair, but it is an improvement which has to be constant; it may be ranked as an enlargement or extension of a work. I intend to vote for some of these bills, but not for all; and I desired to say thus much in explanation of my votes.

Mr. CLAY. In corroboration of what was said by the Senator from Georgia as to the deceptive character of this bill, I wish to call attention to what was said on the subject of this harbor improvement in 1856. At that time the Senator from Wisconsin, General Dodge, offered a bill to appropriate $17,500 for the continuation of the improvement of the harbor of Milwaukee. The Committee on Commerce at that day reported the bill with an amendment. They struck out $17,500 and inserted $35,329, and struck out the word "continuing" and inserted "completing." At that day, according to the report of the topographical engineers, only $35,000 was requisite for the completion of the harbor; that was all they wanted; they would make a finished work of it with that amount. Now, they come here and ask for $28,000 for repairs to preserve the existing works from decay. I think that demonstration will itself suffice to prove the truth of the assertion of the Senator from Georgia, that this is all a delusion; and that if we appropriate this money to preserve the harbor, they will come here hereafter, and, perhaps, ask as much more to complete it—it may be the $35,000 that were asked two years ago.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I have waited to hear some one state the facts particularly connected with this case. My memory is not distinct about it; yet I have an impression, to which I referred the other day, that when the appropriation ran low, a few years ago, and it was found to be impossible to complete the work for the balance of the appropriation, that balance, together with some material and machinery, was turned over to the town to complete the work on a plan of their own, by means to be raised by themselves. There were so many cases, some of which were exactly of that character, that I may be mistaken. I threw out the suggestion the other day, in order that some one specially acquainted with the subject might make a statement. I should be glad now to know that fact; for I think it bears on the case.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator from Mississippi will give way, I will not detain the Senate to make any thorough statement of facts, but I will read from the report of Colonel Graham to show that this $28,000 is not for the purpose of making any addition to the harbor, but for the purpose of repairs. Perhaps the Senator may not be aware of the fact that at Milwaukee there are now two outlets from the river into the lake.

Mr. POLK. What page does the Senator read from.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Page 67. Colonel Graham says:

"The importance of keeping open the entrance to Milwaukee river at its natural mouth, and of keeping the piers created there in good order, is fully explained in my annual report of 1855. Entertaining the same opinions now which were expressed in that report upon this subject, I beg leave to refer you to it, and to the illustrative map submitted with it, marked 'G. No. 16.'"

"The piers forming the harbor at the mouth of this river, so important as a port of refuge and anchorage to the commerce of the lakes generally, are in a state of dreadful dilapidation. If appropriations be not soon granted for their repair, they must go to entire destruction; and, in that case, the mouth of the river—that is to say, its natural outlet—will become stopped up by the formation of a permanent bar across it. Already a large amount of dredging is necessary, in addition to the repair of the piers, in order to save the harbor at this point. In my report of last year, (No. 161.) I submitted an estimate of funds then required for these purposes, amounting to $23,784 25. No appropriation was, however, granted for this work; and now the piers are in a condition requiring a much larger sum to repair them."

"For these repairs I herewith submit an estimate, marked 'B 3,' amounting to the sum of $28,630 41."

This $28,000 I understand to be the sum which is reported by the Committee on Commerce for the repairs. There is also, in Colonel Graham's report, a statement made in relation to the other part of the harbor, and an estimate as to what will be necessary to complete the harbor.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator does not exactly meet the inquiry which I presented. I recollect something of the form of the harbor. The Milwaukee creek running down inside of a little peninsula, enters the lake at a very acute angle to the current which the winds prevailing on the lake produce. That was the mode proposed by the United States engineer for the improvement of the harbor. But there was some dissatisfaction in the town, the authorities of which desired to cut across the peninsula and carry the line shorter into the lake and along the border of the land, or they wished to erect a building. I thought at the time it was very bad engineering, but it was not military engineering, I will say to my friend from Georgia. It was a proposition to bring the current of the creek against the current of the lake at about right angles. That a deposit would be the consequence of the conflict of currents, I could not doubt. The only way to bear the sediment far into the lake was to bring them in contact at such an acute angle as scarcely to destroy the velocity of either; but impinging at an angle of ninety degrees, the current of the creek would be destroyed when it struck the lake.

The amount remaining of the appropriation was very small. As an economical and political question, I was very much opposed to the Government prosecuting these works; and that fact was known generally. It was plain that the balance remaining could not complete the work; and my recollection is that I assented to a proposition, and I wished to know whether that proposition went into effect, to turn over the unexpended balance to the city authorities, with whatever material and machinery the Government had, in order that they might make the short cut which the city authorities proposed, with money to be raised by themselves. If that is the fact, then I think the Government is clear of the work; and if clear of it, I have no disposition to renew the connection by repairing the old piers at the mouth of Milwaukee creek.

Mr. CLAY. When this question was suggested the other day by the Senator from Mississippi, I was not able to answer it. I have since investigated it; but I have not been able to ascertain the facts which he suggests. I think they do exist as to the appropriation for Sheboygan, as I will remark to the Senate when that case is reached; but I think it certainly worthy of further inquiry; and I hope this bill will be postponed, in order that I may examine thoroughly, and see if the facts suggested by the Senator be correct. With that view I move to postpone the bill for the present.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope not.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time. On the question, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. CLAY called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. POLK. I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he is able to respond to the inquiry put by the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I believe you will find on pages 63, 64, and 65, of the report of Colonel Graham, the facts in relation to what was done by the city and what was done by the Government in the construction of that pier. I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate by reading it; but satisfactory information will be found there.

Mr. DURKEE. I would remark, for the information of the Senator from Missouri, that I think there has been no such arrangement made, as was suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, in regard to Milwaukee harbor.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Broderick, Chandler, Colamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hawlin, Harlan, Kennedy, King, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Simmons, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Hammond, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Polk, Reid, Rice, Sibley, and Toombs—18.

So the bill was passed.

HARBOR OF SHEBOYGAN.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 348) making appropriations for repairing the piers at the harbor of Sheboygan, Wisconsin.

Mr. HUNTER. It wants but two minutes of the time for the special order. We cannot get through that bill before the time comes. Let it come up to-morrow in the two morning hours.

Mr. SEWARD. If there will be no objection to taking up the bill to-morrow morning, I shall yield.

Mr. PUGH. I move an amendment. I see no use in dividing this into twenty doses. Let us have it all at once. I offer an amendment to include all these works.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator can move his amendment to-morrow. I move to take up the loan bill.

Mr. SEWARD. We are so far in this business, that I prefer we should go through with these bills. For the purpose of ascertaining the sense of the Senate, I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HUNTER. The hour has come for the consideration of the loan bill, and it will be necessary for the Senator to move a postponement of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is within a minute of the time. The Chair may as well call it up, and the Senator may make his motion to postpone it. The Chair calls up the special order—the loan bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to postpone the consideration of that bill with a view of taking up the river and harbor bills. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Collamer, Crittenden, Davis, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Hammond, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Shields, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Crittenden, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pugh, Seward, Wade, and Wilson—18.

So the motion was not agreed to.

FIFTEEN MILLION LOAN.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 396) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SIMMONS to provide for the home valuation of all foreign imports.

Mr. BELL addressed the Senate three hours and a half on the varied topics involved in the pending measure.

[This speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. SEWARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DURKEE. I wish to state that I have paired off with the Senator from Louisiana, Mr. SLIDELL.

Mr. STUART. I beg leave to state that I have paired off on this question with the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. DIXON.

Mr. KENNEDY. I have paired off with the Senator from Missouri, Mr. GREEN; otherwise I should have voted for the amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Crittenden, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Douglas, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Hammond, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, and Shields—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUNTER. An amendment is necessary since the loan has been made to consist of coupon bonds alone, and that is to strike out the provision which allows the issue of $100 certificates. I should like to hear that clause read, and I wish to offer an amendment to raise it to $1,000.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Provided, That no certificate shall be issued for a less sum than one $100."

Mr. HUNTER. I move to strike out "$100" and insert "$1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STUART. I have paired off with the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. DIXON, on this question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have paired off with the Senator from Missouri, Mr. POLK; otherwise I should vote against the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. I met Mr. POLK and Mr. HALE going down to dinner, arm in arm; and they said they had paired off together. Mr. POLK should not pair off with two Senators.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was a temporary pair. I should vote against the bill, but the Senator from Missouri, Mr. POLK, had occasion to leave the Senate, and I was not aware that he had paired off since.

Mr. HAMLIN. They both asked me to say that they had paired off.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall not vote under the circumstances.

Mr. HUNTER. I was requested by the Senator from Louisiana, Mr. BENJAMIN, to say that he had paired off with the Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. DOOLITTLE.

The result was then announced—yeas 28, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Douglas, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Hammond, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Shields, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Crittenden, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pugh, Seward, Wade, and Wilson—14.

So the bill was passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 201) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1859, and had agreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill with amendments, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the bill and amendments be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I give notice that to-morrow at one o'clock, I shall move to take up the civil appropriation bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to offer an amendment which I am authorized to report from the Committee on the District of Columbia, which I shall offer to the bill that the Senator from Virginia gives notice he will call up to-morrow morning—the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

Mr. BIGLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. JONES. The Senator from Pennsylvania has moved an executive session, and I hope the Senate will go into executive session.

Mr. ALLEN. I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 26, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be on the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in relation to the Senate amendments to the bill of the House (No. 201) making appropriations of the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1859.

Mr. COBB. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that I have a very important bill ready to report from the Committee on Public Lands, if I get an opportunity to report it in the course of the present session. I wish to have it printed, so that the House may understand exactly what it is. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have the bill printed.

Mr. LETCHER. What is the bill?

Mr. COBB. It is a bill changing the preemption laws, and so regulating them that everybody will be able to understand them.

Mr. SEWARD. I made an appeal to the House the other day to allow me to report a bill giving a pension to the widow of Lieutenant Herndon. I am willing that this bill should come in now, if mine can come in in the same way. Otherwise I object.

Mr. COBB. I did not object to the gentleman's bill. If he wants to object to the proposition I have made, let him do it.

Mr. SEWARD. I believe the gentleman did not object to my bill, and I will waive my objection now.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Where is that bill?

Mr. COBB. Here it is.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, then, make your report, and let it go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed.

Mr. COBB. I propose to report it, and have it recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Let it go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman wants to object, let him object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do object to that way of doing business.

Mr. ENGLISH. I wish to inquire what is the regular order of business, and whether it will be in order to call the committees for reports.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in the amendments of the Senate to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, upon which the main question has been ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. After the previous question was seconded, the House, by unanimous consent, went into Committee of the Whole. I hope now, by unanimous consent, we may spend an hour in calling committees for reports. I think it will facilitate business.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire of the Chair if the morning hour will not commence after we have disposed of these bills upon which the main question has been ordered?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. ENGLISH. I wish to inquire if there is any business that will interfere with the call of committee for reports?

Mr. GROW. I think it is of importance that we should get through with the appropriation bills, and I object to the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. FAULKNER. I would inquire if this day has not been set apart for the report of the committee on the Fort Snelling investigation?

The SPEAKER. The report of the Fort Snelling committee was postponed until to-day.

Mr. FAULKNER. Then I object to everything not in order.

Mr. MORRILL. The report does not come up until after the morning hour—does it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will look into that.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The House is rather thin this morning, and I would suggest that, by unanimous consent, the committees be called for reports which shall give rise to no discussion, for reference only.

Mr. COBB. I object to that; and call for the regular order of business.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not wish to lose my temper this morning, and I give notice that I shall object to everything except the appropriation bills.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the Senate amendments to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

First amendment of the Senate:

Insert, after the item for paying the compensation of mileage of Senators:

And a sufficient sum, in addition thereto, to pay the mileage of the newly elected members of the Senate in attendance at the called executive session, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1857; but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to allow constructive mileage.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a non-concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. LETCHER called for the yeas and nays on concurring.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DEAN and SINGLETON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—forty-one in the affirmative—more than one fifth the number present.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 25, nays 153; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Bingham, Bishop, Bliss, Bonham, Branch, Bryan, Buffinton, Burnett, Burroughs, Case, Caskie, Cavanaugh, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Corning, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dean, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Edie, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilman, Goode, Goodwin, Grainger, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Harlan, Haskin, Hatch, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Lester, Letcher, MacIay, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Peyton, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Robbins, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Seales, Scott, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stanton, Stevenson, William Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Tompkins, Trippe, Underwood, Vallandigham, Wade, Walton, Watkins, White, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—153.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

Pending the vote,

Mr. EDIE stated that he was absent from the House on Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday last on account of ill health, and had paired off for those days with his colleague, Mr. LEIDY.

Second amendment:

In line twenty-six, under the head of "contingent expenses of the Senate," strike out "one at $1,080 and one at $750," and insert "at $1,080 each," so as to make the clause read:

"Two messengers at $1,080 each."

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended a concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

At the end of same paragraph strike out the gross amount of "$78,584," and insert "$78,914."

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended a concurrence in the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

Add at the end of line fifty-three as follows: "For the additional compensation allowed by the resolution of the Senate of the 11th of May, 1858, to a messenger in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, $330."

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended a non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

For stationery for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1858, $5,000.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was non-concurred in.

Sixth amendment:

For miscellaneous items for fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1858, $9,000.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was non-concurred in.

Seventh amendment:

From the following paragraph strike out the word "seventy," and in lieu thereof insert "sixty:"

"For binding twenty-four copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each member and delegate of the second session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, $8,097 50: Provided, That no greater price shall be paid for the same than seventy cents for each volume or part actually bound and delivered."

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a non-concurrence in that amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I hope that this amendment of the Senate will be concurred in.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 106, noes 38.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Eighth amendment:

To pay to the reporters of the Senate the usual extra compensation, for the third session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, $800 each, $3,200.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I demand the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I suggest that, as the eighth, ninth, and tenth amendments are on the same subject, the vote be taken on them together.

Mr. MASON. I object. I understand that one of these amendments is for the third session, which lasted only a few days.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I will correct the gentleman. The third session was the last session.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The House divided on ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes 21, noes 113; one fifth not voting in the affirmative.

Mr. HOUSTON. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 84, noes 68.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Ninth amendment:

To pay to the reporters of the Senate the usual extra compensation for the first session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, $800 each, $3,200.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Bonham, Bowie, Branch, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Florence, Foster, Gillis, Gilman, Goode, Goodwin, Grainger, Greenwood, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Hawkins, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelly, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, Lovejoy, MacIay, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Purviance, Quitman, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Scott, Sealing, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Vallandigham, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, White, Wilson, and Augustus R. Wright—114.

NAYS—Messrs. Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Boccock, Burnett, Caskie, Ezra Clark, Cobb, Cockerill, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Mississippi, Dean, Dimmick, Edie, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Gregg, Harlan, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Lawrence, Lester, Letcher, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Powell, Ready, Reagan, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Stephens, Talbot, George Taylor, Tompkins, Trippe, Underwood, Waldron, Watkins, Woodson, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—68.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Tenth amendment:

"To pay the reporters of the Senate the usual extra compensation, for the second session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, $800 each, $3,200."

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Eleventh amendment:

Strike out from the clause "For the compensation of the draughtsman and clerks employed upon the land maps, clerks to committees, and temporary clerks in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, $17,800," the words "draughtsman and clerks employed upon the land maps."

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a non-concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. CLEMENS demanded the yeas and nays upon concurring in the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 80, nays 104; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Bliss, Boccock, Bonham, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burroughs, Caskie, Clemens, Cobb, Cockerill, Corning, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Dodd, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Foley, Gartrell, Greenwood, Gregg, Harlan, Hill, Houston, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, Jacob M. Kunkel, Leiter, Letcher, MacIay, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miller, Millson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Pendleton, Peyton, Phillips, Pottle, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Seales, Scott, Henry M. Shaw, Singleton, William Smith, Stephens, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Trippe, Underwood, Vallandigham, Wade, Watkins, Winslow, Woodson, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—80.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Andrews, Arnold, Barksdale, Bennett, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bowie, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dimmick, Durfee, Florence, Foster, Gillis, Gilman, Glumer, Goode, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Howard, Horton, Howard, Hughes, Huyler, J. Glancy Jones, Jones, Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lovejoy, Matteson, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Pike, Potter, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Sealing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Sickles, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, White, Wilson, and Wortendyke—104.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

[Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, here reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Nancy Serena; which was thereupon signed by the Speaker.]

Mr. SICKLES moved to reconsider the vote by which the eleventh amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Twelfth amendment:

From the same clause, strike out the word "seventeen" and insert "eight."

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. SICKLES moved to reconsider the last vote; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Thirteenth amendment:

Insert the following:

For procuring manure, tools, fuel, repairs, purchasing trees and shrubs for botanic garden, to be expended under the direction of the Library Committee of Congress, $2,300.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence in the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourteenth amendment:

Insert the following:

For pay of horticulturist and assistants in the botanic garden and green-houses, to be expended under the direction of the Library Committee of Congress, $5,121 50.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether these salaries are provided for by law?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The salaries grow incidentally out of the law.

Mr. PETTIT. With the consent of the House, I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that the compensation of these officers is fixed, under the authority of law, by the Joint Committee on the Library; and the appropriation is made accordingly.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the amendment was concurred in.

Fifteenth amendment:

Insert the following:

For refitting and repairing damages to the green-houses by the hail storm of June, 1857, $1,044 16.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Sixteenth amendment:

Insert the following:

To enable the Secretary of State to carry into effect the act entitled "An act for the admission of Kansas into the Union," $10,000.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Seventeenth amendment:

Insert the following:

And the authority conferred upon the principal clerk of public lands, of acting Commissioner ad interim, in the absence, &c., of the Commissioner, by the second section of the act reorganizing the General Land Office, approved 4th July, 1836, shall be, and the same hereby is, transferred to the chief clerk of said General Land Office.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence. The amendment was concurred in.

Eighteenth amendment:

Insert the following:

For the preservation of the collections of the exploring and surveying expeditions of the Government, $4,000.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence. The amendment was concurred in.

Nineteenth amendment:

Insert the following:

For the transfer to, and new arrangement of those collections in, the Smithsonian Institution, $1,000.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence. The amendment was concurred in.

Twentieth amendment:

Insert the following:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the superintendent of the building occupied by the Secretary and his Department, from the 1st day of January, 1855, to the 30th day of June, 1858, the allowance to be made to such superintendent, with his salary as clerk, not to exceed $2,000 per annum, the sum of $700.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence. The amendment was concurred in.

Twenty-first amendment:

Insert the following:

For clerk hire, office rent, fuel, and lights at the several district land offices of the land States and Territories, to be apportioned in such manner as, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, the public interest may require, $50,000.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Twenty-second amendment:

Strike out the following:

For compensation of the surveyor general of Utah, and the clerks in his office, $3,000.

For rent of the surveyor general's office in Utah, fuel, books, stationery, furniture, and other incidental expenses, $1,500.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence. The amendment was concurred in.

Twenty-third amendment:

Insert the following:

And the compensation of superintendent may be allowed to the clerk who has performed, or may hereafter perform, the duties of that officer; the allowance to be made to such superintendent, with his salary as clerk, not to exceed $2,000.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence in the amendment, with an amendment as follows: after the word "who," in the second line of said amendment, strike out the words "has performed, or."

The amendment to the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was then concurred in.

Twenty-fourth amendment:

Insert the following:

For defraying the expenses incurred in taking the census of the Territory of Minnesota, under the act approved 26th February, 1857, $20,000: Provided, The compensation to the officers taking the same shall not exceed that allowed by the acts of 23d May, 1850, and 30th August, 1850, to those who took the census in California, Oregon, Utah, and New Mexico.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence. The amendment was concurred in.

Twenty-fifth amendment:

Insert the following:

For services of special counsel, and other extraordinary expenses, in defending the title of the United States to public property in California, $40,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The Clerk proceeded to read the next amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. What became of the twenty-fifth amendment?

The SPEAKER. It was concurred in.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I wanted the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended a concurrence in the amendment, and the House has already concurred in it.

Mr. MORGAN. The question was not understood.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 76, nays 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Boccock, Bowie, Branch, Burnett, Cavanaugh, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cockerill, Cox, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Dimmick, Edmundson, Elliott, Faulkner, Florence, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, Letcher, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Miller, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, John S. Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Russell, Scales, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stevenson, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Vallandigham, Watkins, White, Winslow, Wortendyke, and Augustus K. Wright—76.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Andrews, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Bullinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Clawson, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Edie, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Hill, Horton, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Murray, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Ready, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Ruffin, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippie, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wood, Woodson, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—97.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The vote was then reconsidered, and the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

Twenty-sixth amendment:

Insert the following:

For the employment of such number of clerks, not exceeding three, by the district attorney of the northern district of California, as may be necessary to transcribe the records of the district court in land cases, upon which appeals have been, or may be taken to the Supreme Court, such sum as may be necessary is hereby appropriated, provided the compensation shall not exceed $150 a month, for each.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended a non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Twenty-seventh amendment:

Insert the following:

For the reasonable expenses of the late and present district attorneys for the northern district of California, for assistance in their office, such sum is to be paid out of the judicial fund, if such expenses shall be approved by the Attorney General: Provided, That those expenses shall not exceed $300 per month: And provided further, That this appropriation shall be applicable only to the present fiscal year and the next succeeding fiscal year, which will terminate on the 30th day of June, 1859.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended a non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Twenty-eighth amendment:

In line nine hundred and thirty-seven strike out "$5,511," and insert "$7,920," so that the clause will read: "For the support and maintenance of said penitentiary, $7,920 25."

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended a concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Twenty-ninth amendment:

Insert the following:

For compensation of two additional guards, hereby authorized, $1,320.

The amendment was concurred in.

Thirtieth, and last amendment of the Senate:

Strike out the following clause:

"No part of the amount appropriated by any act of Congress for the service of any one fiscal year shall be used for or applied to the service of any other year, nor be transferred to or used for any branch of expenditure than that for which it may be specifically appropriated: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall apply to the appropriations for the present or next fiscal year."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Hereafter the estimates for the various Executive Departments shall designate not only the amount required to be appropriated for the next fiscal year, but also the amount of the outstanding appropriation, if there be any, which will probably be required to be used for each particular item of expenditure.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended a non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the several votes by which the House concurred and non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The House then proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 198) making appropriations for the preservation and repairs of fortifications and other works of defense, barracks, and quarters, for the year ending 30th June, 1859, reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The SPEAKER stated that the question was on concurring in the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BOWIE. I have an amendment to offer to this bill.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order at the present time.

Mr. STANTON. I call for the yeas and nays on striking out the enacting clause.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOWIE. Would an amendment be in order to the bill?

The SPEAKER. Not at the present stage of proceedings.

Mr. BOWIE. Would an amendment be in order if the House refuse to strike out the enacting clause?

The SPEAKER. It would depend upon what the amendment was.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the amendment made an appropriation, it would have to go to Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to be considered—would it not?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. QUITMAN. I wish very much to introduce a proposition to recommit this bill to the committee, with instructions to report specific appropriations for the various works. I wish to know if such a motion would be in order?

The SPEAKER. Not while the motion is pending to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. QUITMAN. Suppose that motion should be lost?

The SPEAKER. The motion would then be in order.

Mr. STANTON. If the House should reject the bill it would be in order for the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill containing specific items of appropriation—would it not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes it would.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Atkins, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Bullinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Dowdell, Edie, Elliott, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Hawkins, Hill, Hoard, Howard, Jewett, George W. Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Lawrence, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Reagan, Reilly, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Sandidge, Scott, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Trippie, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Whitley, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, and John V. Wright—99.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Anderson, Arnold, Barksdale, Bennett, Bingham, Boccock, Boyce, Branch, Brayton, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Cockerill, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Dimmick, Durfee, Edmundson, English, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Horton, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Millson, Moore, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Ruffin, Russell, Scales, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Sickles, Singleton, William Smith, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Tompkins, Vallandigham, Israel Washburn, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—87.

So the enacting clause was stricken out, and the bill rejected.

Pending the vote,

Mr. BONHAM stated that if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he should have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. STANTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the enacting clause was stricken out; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON DOORKEEPER'S ACCOUNTS.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to submit a report from the select committee appointed to inquire into the conduct of the late Doorkeeper; and I move that it be printed and made the special order for Tuesday next.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I must object to its being made the special order.

The SPEAKER. The committee were empowered to report at any time, and it is the right of the gentleman to make the report.

The report was accompanied with a bill to provide for the folding and distribution of documents of the House of Representatives; which was read a first and second time.

The report was also accompanied with the following resolution:

Resolved, That all extra copies of books and documents printed by order of the House of Representatives, and divided equally among the members of the House, are intended for gratuitous distribution to public libraries and among the people, and are given to members respectively in trust for that purpose; and that any other use or disposition of the same is a violation of the trust aforesaid, and an abuse which meets the unqualified disapprobation of this House.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I move to postpone the subject until the first Tuesday in December next.

Mr. LETCHER. I want to know if this subject can take precedence of the Fort Snelling report, which has been set down for to-day?

The SPEAKER. The objection comes too late, in the opinion of the Chair. The question is first upon the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GREENWOOD] to postpone until the first Tuesday in December next.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, sir, I think that ought not to be done. Now, sir, when a man who is or has been an officer of this House is arraigned before the House on grave charges made against him, it is due to him, and it is due to the members of the House, that the House should fix an early day for his trial, in order that the charge may not fester in the public mind. I think it is due to the party charged and to ourselves that the matter should be taken up and disposed of during the present session.

Mr. HUGHES. I would respectfully suggest to the House that they can better understand the merits of this matter if they will allow it to be postponed until the report has been printed. They can then dispose of it as they see proper.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that if the subject be postponed till Tuesday next, it will then be competent for the House to postpone it until a further day, if it shall see fit.

Mr. STANTON. Will that make it a special order?

The SPEAKER. No further than it is now. The authority given to the committee to report at any time involves the necessity of disposing of it. But it is within the control of the House to postpone the further consideration of it until any day they may see proper.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Will it come up as a special order on Tuesday?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I understand that this is a matter which will not be in the way of the business of the House. I will, therefore, withdraw my motion to postpone until December next.

The motion to print and postpone until Tuesday next was agreed to.

LOAN BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I appeal to the House to allow me to submit two reports from the Committee of Ways and Means. Unless they are now received and referred, it is hardly possible that they will be acted on in time for the adjournment.

There being no objection,

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to authorize a loan, not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF COLLECTING THE REVENUE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, from the same committee, reported back a bill making an appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenues from customs; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

FORT SNELLING INVESTIGATION.

The SPEAKER stated the business in order to be on the resolutions reported by the Fort Snelling investigating committee, as follows:

Resolved, 1. That the sale of the military post at Fort Snelling and so much of the reservation attached to it as was necessary for military purposes, made on the 6th day of June, 1857, under the authority of the Secretary of War, the same being then and now retained under the authority of that Department because necessary for military purposes, was without authority of law.

2. That the said sale was made by the Secretary of War notwithstanding his knowledge of the official opinions of his predecessor, the Hon. JEFFERSON DAVIS, and of other officers in superior military command to the contrary, without consulting with, without the advice, and without the knowledge of any officer in the service of any rank, leaving the question of the retention of that post to the discretion of the commissioners appointed to make the sale; and that this action on the part of the Secretary of War was a grave official fault.

3. That with a knowledge of the great value of the Fort Snelling post and reservation, and the importance of great caution and judgment in making the sale, the Secretary of War appointed as agents for the purpose, unqualified, inexperienced, and incompetent men.

4. That provision for and management of the sale were so negligently, carelessly, and injudiciously made, as to induce a successful combination against the Government, exclude all competition, and bring a loss on the Government.

5. That John C. Mather, agent of the Department of War for the examination and sale of the Fort Ripley reservation, after having already joined a combination for the purchase of the Fort Snelling reservation, acted, in making such purchase, in violation of his official duty, and against the known policy of the Government, and that, as to him and Richard Schell, represented by him as agent, and Steele and Graham, who were complicated in the sale with him, with a full knowledge of this official character, the sale of the Fort Snelling reservation was at the time and is now void.

Mr. MORRILL took the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I move that the consideration of the report of the select committee in reference to the sale of Fort Snelling be postponed until the second Tuesday in December next. I make that motion on my own responsibility, without consultation with any human beings; and I do it for the simple reason that we are now within eight working days of the close of the session, and that it will take two days to dispose of this question. It is absolutely necessary that the practical business of this Congress shall be closed before the time fixed for the adjournment. If this question is taken up and debated, as it necessarily will be debated, it will require two or three days to get through with it. I believe that it can be postponed without doing any injustice to the country, and I make the motion to postpone in good faith.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned personally, I would prefer to go on now. I do not desire to interrupt more important business, but if the other side desire a longer time to examine the testimony, and it shall be the sense of the House to postpone this matter to a day certain in next week, I will make no objection. I prefer that it should not go over until next session. If the gentleman will modify his motion to make it a special order for Tuesday next, I shall have no objection. By that time we will get through with all of our appropriation bills, and, I hope, have time to consider it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman decline to yield the floor to the gentleman from Indiana to submit the motion he has indicated?

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I trust that the gentleman will allow my motion to be put to the House, that its sense may be taken on it.

Mr. MORRILL. I will allow the motion to be made; and will move, as an amendment, that the matter be postponed until Tuesday next.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. If it is to be considered at all during this session, I say let it be taken up to-day.

Mr. MORRILL. I will allow the motion to be put, and the sense of the House taken on it.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to say that in my present condition of health it may be desirable that this discussion should not proceed now. Yet I believe that justice to the Secretary of War demands that this House should act on this question; and, sir, for one, I am unwilling that there shall be one moment's further delay about it. We are ready to meet the accusation in all its forms, and to have it disposed of by the judgment of this House.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. It seems to me a little surprising that, when this House has directed an investigation to be made of the conduct of one of the Cabinet officers of this Government, and the committee of the House has reported a resolution of censure—when you have arraigned the Secretary of War—when you have preferred your bill of indictment against him, there should be an effort to postpone its further consideration. I think that it is our duty to investigate the matter, and to make up our judgment on the resolutions reported in this case, and either to relieve the Secretary of War from having done anything wrong or exceeded his authority, or to censure him. By agreeing to the motion pending, you leave him with the charge preferred against him, hanging over him until the next session. It seems to me to be an unprecedented procedure. Gentlemen say we have not time to attend to it. Why, we are salaried officers; and why should we not sit here and discharge the public business which devolves upon us? I am as anxious to leave this city, and return to my family, and to mingle with the people of my district, as any member of this House; but I am willing to remain here, and extend the session, if it is necessary, in order to transact the public business before us. Here is a proposition to postpone the consideration of this question until the next session of Congress. I ask whether the members of this House will be any better prepared then than they are now to act upon it? I ask if they will be any better prepared to discuss this question, if we are to have a discussion, than they are at this moment? Then, I appeal to members of the House to vote down the proposition to postpone, and let us proceed to the consideration of this matter.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 26, nays 167; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Bingham, Brayton, Burroughs, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Farnsworth, Groesbeck, Harlan, Horton, Howard, Kelsey, Humphrey Marshall, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Potte, Ricard, Seward, Aaron Shaw, William Stewart, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, and Waldron—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bliss, Biscoe, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bufinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Case, Caskie, Cavanaugh, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Clark R. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Conins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goode, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Maclay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Murray, Niblack, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Keilly, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Scales, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippie, Vallandigham, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—167.

So the House refused to postpone the subject till December next.

Pending the vote,

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, stated that Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, had paired off.

After the announcement of the vote, as above recorded—

Mr. BURNETT. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to yield to me for a moment. I understand from the gentleman from Vermont that he desires that this question may be postponed until next Thursday week, so that we may take up the appropriation bills, pass and send them to the Senate. I am willing to accede to that proposition, if it will meet the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the consideration of this report is postponed until Thursday week, we may just as well consent to let it go over until the next session of Congress. When that day comes, there will be no time to take it up and discuss it.

Mr. SINGLETON. I object.

Mr. BURNETT. I wish to modify the proposition. I will make it next Tuesday.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move to postpone its consideration until next Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion except by unanimous consent. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman to the latter clause of the 55th rule, which says:

"No motion to postpone to a day certain, to commit, or to postpone indefinitely, being decided, shall be again allowed on the same day, and at the same stage of the bill or proposition."

Mr. RUFFIN. I object.

Mr. GROW. The first motion was to postpone until next session. This motion is to postpone until next week.

The SPEAKER. It is a motion to postpone until a day certain.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand that the gentleman who objected to the report going over until next Tuesday, withdraws it.

Mr. RUFFIN. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the further consideration of the report will be postponed until Tuesday next.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

Mr. WHITTELEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce for reference the fortification bill, which I offered yesterday as an amendment to the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Is not the regular order of business the call of committees for reports?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Then I call for the regular order of business.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GROW. I think we had better get through the appropriation bills, and send them to the Senate; and, therefore, I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SICKLES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

The first reading of the bill having been dispensed with, the Clerk commenced the reading of the bill by clauses for amendment, and read the first clause.

Mr. COLFAX. I would suggest, from the experience of yesterday, that the better plan would be to close debate upon this bill, and have all the debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I propose to do that very thing, and for that purpose I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly a bill making appropriation for the service of the naval department for the year ending June 30, 1859, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I offer the usual resolution to close the debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the naval appropriation bill in five minutes after the committee shall again resume the consideration of the same.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "five minutes," and inserting "two hours," and I desire to make a statement to the House. This is the bill making appropriation for the support of the Navy. Sometimes it has been the case that the Committee of Ways and Means have exercised the courtesy towards the Committee on Naval Affairs to consult them somewhat in relation to the bill making appropriations for the naval service of the country. That has not been done in this instance. We were not aware that this bill was to be called up at the time it was called up. It came upon us altogether by surprise. When I saw that the bill had been taken up last evening in the Committee of the Whole on the state Union, I intended to make a statement of the facts—

Mr. PURVIANCE. Is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks debate is not in order, if it is objected to.

Mr. PURVIANCE. I object.

Mr. BOCKOCK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania this morning agreed that the bill should be laid aside and another bill taken up.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BOCKOCK. Well, my amendment is in order, and I insist on it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would like to understand the Chair. I understand that the question is on closing debate in five minutes, and is it not in order to hear reasons bearing upon that question?

The SPEAKER. It has been the uniform practice not to entertain any debate whatever upon a resolution proposing to close debate.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means a question.

The SPEAKER. Debate is objected to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not proposing to debate the question. I suppose I have a right to ask a question. I desire to know how much this bill appropriates?

Mr. DEAN. I object to debate.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means answer my question?

Mr. FLORENCE. I submit that the proposition of my colleague to close debate upon this bill is not in order, inasmuch as the bill has not yet been considered in Committee of the Whole. I submit further that it is not in order, after debate has been closed, for the Committee of the Whole to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, because yesterday the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means in reference to fortifications, was—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question when it arises.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, I move to amend the proposition so as to provide that the committee shall not strike out the enacting clause.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides the amendment to be out of order, on the ground that it is not germane to the original proposition. It is a change of the rules of the House.

Mr. FLORENCE. I thought it was entirely consistent with the rules of the House. I want the matter considered by the House. The fortification bill was not considered at all yesterday.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I make the point of order, that after the Chair has decided the amendment out of order, it is not in order for the gentleman to go on and argue it.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish the unanimous consent of the House to make one or two remarks in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia as to the taking up of this bill last evening.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object. I was not allowed to debate the question.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and debate is not in order.

The question being upon Mr. Bockock's amendment to the resolution,

Mr. FLORENCE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CLAY demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs RUSSELL and WALDRON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 86.

So the amendment was rejected.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON. If there is no objection, I propose to move that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill, and that it be brought into the House for consideration. It only appropriates ten or twelve millions—a matter of very slight importance; and why not bring it out of committee and pass it at once?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama is not in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is in order by unanimous consent: is it not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes so.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I propose, if there be no objection, to submit that motion. The House has agreed to cut off all debate in committee upon this subject, and why not bring it into the House at once?

Mr. DEAN and others objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. CLAY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I withdraw the motion; and move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SICKLES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The first section of the bill was read.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, obtained the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to know if I am not entitled to the floor to close debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be entitled to the floor for that purpose after the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] shall have occupied the five minutes, at the end of which the House has ordered that debate shall be closed.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is the gentleman entitled to close a debate which has never been opened.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania having reported the bill under consideration, is entitled to one hour in which to close debate.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It was my wish, but that I have been very unwell for some days past, to call the attention of the committee to a provision in this bill which I regard of very considerable importance. It is known, I suppose, to this committee, that the service provided for in the particular clause to which I refer, was first authorized under the resolution of 1845. I allude to the service between the Atlantic and the Pacific, between New York and San Francisco. The contracts were made, as I am informed, by some species of combination in legislation which I do not understand, between the Secretary of the Navy and the Postmaster General. The contract commenced on the 1st of October, 1848, and terminates, by its own terms, on the 1st of October, 1858. It is under consideration, as I understand, upon the passage of this proposition, to continue this service under the old contract. In other words, if this clause is passed without qualification, the effect will be to continue this old contract which has been so beneficial to the parties interested in it, as I conceive, against the public interest, as also against the indignant resistance of the whole Pacific coast. It was my intention to have drawn the attention of the committee very carefully to the consideration of this subject, and to have presented the question, whether or not a company which has grown from nothing—from the mere bounty of the Government—into an immense concern, of large wealth, shall be placed for the future beyond the chance of competition? I have no time under the action of the House to present the facts which I have in my possession upon this subject; but I state that this company, which has been carried on on capital furnished by the United States—that is, by money advanced by law to particular individuals—has grown rich in the service, and now it is proposed to continue this monopoly to them, unless a provision is inserted in this bill to prohibit it.

I do not desire to detain the committee. I will, however, call their attention briefly and rapidly to a few statements upon this subject. The mail service on one of these routes, from New York to Aspinwall, commenced in 1848; and I understand it has been construed to extend for a period of years to come. The other, from Panama to San Francisco—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Mr. Chairman, in the House I submitted a resolution closing debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union within five minutes after the consideration of the Navy appropriation bill was resumed, for the reason that I believed it was the desire of the House to get through with the appropriation bills without unnecessary debate, with a view to the adjournment on the 7th of June. I wish to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Virginia—

Mr. BOCOCK. I rise to a question of order on the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that it is not in order for him to refer to anything but the bill under consideration. I do not care, however, what he says, provided that I be heard in reply. If he goes on and I get up to respond, some gentleman on the other side will call me to order. If it be agreed that I shall be allowed to reply, I have no objection to his going on; for I am in for it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have no intention to make any remark unkind, uncharitable, and unfair, but merely to say that the gentleman from Virginia was laboring under a misapprehension in regard to the taking up of this bill.

Mr. BOWIE. I rise to a point of order. I want to know what is unkind, uncharitable, and unfair, under the rules? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide questions as they arise. He does not think that there is any necessity for a decision of the question raised by the gentleman.

Mr. BOWIE. There is no charity about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to correct a misapprehension of the gentleman from Virginia. This bill was not taken up of my own accord.

Mr. STANTON. What question is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Navy appropriation bill; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is now occupying the floor under the rule, in closing the general debate.

Mr. STANTON. I insist; then, that his remarks shall be confined to the bill; and I shall object to anything outside of the legitimate discussion of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has intimated that debate must be confined to the bill.

Mr. LEITER. I wish to ask the Chair—

Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. LEITER. To my asking a question?

Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. LEITER. I will make a point of order. I make the point that the gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot close debate in the hour he is allowed under the rule, until the bill has been read through by sections for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks, as the time allowed for general debate has terminated, that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is now entitled to the floor to close debate.

Mr. LEITER. Has the bill been read through?

The CHAIRMAN. The first reading of the bill was dispensed with by unanimous consent.

Mr. LEITER. I make the point that debate cannot be closed until the bill has been read through for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Ohio on the ground he has already stated.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have to say that, if gentlemen do not want to take up the time of the committee, they will let me proceed without interruption. I do not intend to occupy more than five or ten minutes.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee. I object to the interruption, unless it is to raise a point of order.

Mr. SEWARD. Do I understand the Chair to say that the five-minute debate has closed?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has only decided that the general debate has been closed, under the order of the House.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This bill was not taken up in committee, in preference to other appropriation bills, on my motion. My desire was that the committee should take up the bill to pay the volunteers. I did not want to take up the Navy appropriation bill until I had heard from the Committee on Naval Affairs. So far from having objection to any communication with that committee, I was, on the contrary, willing to hear from them; and I will say that my own opinions are in accordance with what I understand to be their opinions. This appropriation bill was taken up because it was the first upon the Calendar. When it was up, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs asked me whether I had any objection to take up another bill. I told him that I would be willing to do so, provided I could obtain the consent of the House. It was the wish of the House that the consideration of the bill should be proceeded with.

I am not aware, I confess, that it is the duty of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to seek consultations with the chairmen of other committees of the House, with a view to regulate the appropriation bills; but I consider that it would be discourteous, in case of a chairman of a committee desiring to consult with the Committee of Ways and Means on a certain matter, if the request were not cheerfully complied with. I do not understand, however, that it is the duty of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to seek interviews with other committees, in order to know how they wish the appropriation bills to be drawn up. I am utterly ignorant of any rule requiring such action; and if I have committed an error on that score, it is to be ascribed not to design, but to my ignorance.

Mr. Chairman, this is the usual Navy appropriation bill. The estimates of the Secretary of the Navy for the last year were $13,062,561 79; and for the next fiscal year $13,680,448 23. These estimates were reduced to the very lowest point at which, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, this very important branch of the service of the Government can be carried on. The committee are aware of its immense importance at this particular crisis; and so far as I am informed upon the subject, the great feeling manifested upon the part of the Committee on Naval Affairs, is with a view of increasing, instead of diminishing, the appropriation, by adding four steam sloops for the service. The Secretary of the Navy was of opinion that $13,680,448 was the smallest amount with which the service could be carried on; but the Committee of Ways and Means, after frequent consultation, and after a careful and scrutinizing examination of the items, succeeded in reducing the appropriation $538,894. That reduction was not made upon the principle that the whole sum was not necessary for the efficient service of the Naval Department, but upon the ground that the scarcity of money required that, for the next fiscal year, we should reduce the expenditures to the lowest possible amount. Every dollar estimated for is absolutely required, if you want to make the Navy thoroughly efficient. In reducing it to the lowest possible point of efficiency, you may dispense with $500,000; and the Committee of Ways and Means have so recommended. The appropriation then asked for for the next fiscal year, for this branch of the public service, is $13,149,544 23, not including what may be added by some small amendments which I intend to offer.

I propose, Mr. Chairman, to offer some five amendments, and I will refer to them now, to save the necessity of explaining them when I shall offer them. The first two amendments do not increase the appropriation at all, but merely direct in what manner the appropriation shall be applied. The third amendment is an appropriation of $3,000 to pay for a code ordered by Congress. The fourth is an appropriation of $110,000 to pay the expenses of courts of inquiry by naval officers ordered by Congress, and held in this city, and not yet paid for. The fifth amendment is to appropriate $5,000 to pay for charts of the navigation and exploration of the La Platte river.

I ask the Chair, now, what portion of my time I have consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. About twenty minutes.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am willing to yield the remainder of my time to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BOCOCK said the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, had agreed distinctly, in a consultation this morning, that this bill might go over for the present, and that other bills might be considered this evening in its stead. Whatever condition the gentleman might have contemplated in agreeing to this arrangement was tacit, and not expressed. He (Mr. B.) knew nothing of such condition; he was entirely unprepared to present to the committee the several subjects which he had designed to bring forward in connection with this bill. He had therefore some reason to complain of the course which had been pursued; he had no unkind feeling towards the gentleman from Pennsylvania, on the contrary, he respected him. And, in complaining of his action in this matter, he did not intend to be unnecessarily harsh.

The gentleman made use of one remark, a few minutes ago, which he considered rather unkind. He (Mr. B.) objected to his making a statement in relation to the understanding between them this morning unless he could reply. The gentleman from Pennsylvania remarked that he was sorry that he (Mr. B.) should take refuge under the rules of the House against his statement. If he had been disposed to be unkind, the retort was at hand. He could have reminded the committee that men take refuge sometimes from storms of hail; but sometimes also from storms of wind. He refrained, however, and contented himself with merely saying that, if he could be allowed to reply, he wished the gentleman from Pennsylvania to go on. Let all this pass. If the Committee of Ways and Means had consulted the Committee on Naval Affairs in relation to this bill, as has been done heretofore, we should have been ready with our amendments and suggestions, and this difficulty might have been avoided. He knew that many of the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs expected to be consulted.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I do not wish to interfere, but I submit whether it is in order for the gentleman to discuss questions of etiquette between committees of this House.

Mr. BOCOCK. Why did not the gentleman raise this question on the gentleman from Pennsylvania? I know the gentleman from Illinois is a master of etiquette, and I invoke his judgment upon his own course in this matter.

Though not having time enough to discuss all the subjects arising under this bill, to which the attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs has been directed, and being not prepared, in fact, to do justice to any of them, I cannot refrain from calling attention to one of them. The Committee on Naval Affairs have directed me to report a bill for the construction of ten small sloops-of-war, with full steam power, and drawing not more than twelve feet of water. This measure was recommended by the Secretary of the Navy at the beginning of the session, and surely circumstances have not tended since then to render the measure less wise.

Mr. B. then proceeded to enforce the importance of the proposed measure by a variety of considerations. The improvements which have been made in gunnery render small vessels comparatively much more effective than formerly. A few small vessels, armed with large guns, can terribly annoy and perhaps destroy the largest sized vessel in the British or American Navy, armed with many more guns than all the small ones together. Then the ports of all the southern coast of the United States, and those of Mexico and Central America, are so shallow that a vessel drawing more than fourteen feet of water can enter none of them at low water, except, perhaps, that of Brunswick, in Georgia.

It would be a great saving of expense to have a number of these small vessels, because one or two of them, together with one of the larger steamers which we have recently constructed, would constitute a sufficient force for almost any of our squadrons. And it is much cheaper to keep these vessels afloat than one of the larger class of our steamers.

Mr. B. alluded to recent occurrences in the Gulf of Mexico, and suggested that, in view of them, this would be a judicious measure. He was no alarmist; and did not desire to inflame the public mind precipitately or unnecessarily. These occurrences had been made, he knew, the subject of negotiation with the British Government. The negotiation was in safe hands. He had every confidence that it would be well managed. But nothing, he would submit, was better calculated to give weight to argument and emphasis to diplomacy than to be prepared to defend our rights if negotiations failed.

He hoped that the conduct of these British naval officers would be repudiated by their Government, and that ample reparation would be made for the outrages which had been committed upon our rights and upon our honor.

It cannot be denied, however, that these outrages have been too numerous, and too long continued, to admit the idea that they are accidental. It is clear that they spring from system and design. Whence that design emanates, it is impossible to say. Time will determine. We must look at the case in all its aspects, and be prepared for any contingency that may arise. For one, he was prepared to say, that the claim to the right of visitation or search is one that can never be allowed to the British navy. It is injurious to our honor, and invasive of our rights, and is founded in a false interpretation of international law.

Mr. B. proceeded to suggest many considerations on this subject, going to show the necessity for the construction of a number of small steam vessels of war, and gave notice that he would move an amendment to the bill, giving authority for their construction.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

The following clause being under consideration:

"For increase, repair, armament, and equipment of the Navy, including the wear and tear of vessels in commission, fuel for steamers, and purchase of hemp for the Navy, $2,850,000."

Mr. BRANCH moved to strike out the words "fifty thousand dollars," and said: I had already made up my mind that the circumstances surrounding our public affairs at this time render it proper that there should be an increase in our naval force, before hearing the perspicuous remarks of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. BOGGS.] I have not, therefore, in offering this amendment, designed to indicate any desire to reduce the amount of appropriation applicable to an increase of our Navy; but simply to call the attention of the committee to the indefinite character of this clause of the bill. It will be observed that it appropriates $2,850,000 for increase, repair, armament, and equipment of the Navy, including the wear and tear of vessels in commission, fuel for steamers, and purchase of hemp for the Navy. I think it of great importance to make all appropriations specific, as far as circumstances will permit, and object to the unspecific character of the appropriations made by this clause.

By referring to the estimates laid before us at the commencement of the present session, for information as to what objects are embraced under that item, I find there is nothing to throw light upon it, except the simple words "construction, &c., $2,850,000." I find that in the same book of estimates almost an entire page, in small type, is taken up with small items in regard to the medical bureau, altogether amounting to only $32,150, while only one word and a few figures are devoted to explaining to the House the objects to which this large appropriation is designed to be applied. If it is for an increase of the Navy, that is very well; but as I understand it, we are to be called upon hereafter to vote a separate and specific appropriation for increasing the Navy. If it is for repairs, we ought to have some specification of the items in the way of repairs which are to cost more than two and a half million dollars. Then there is the general clause for the "equipment of the Navy, including the wear and tear of vessels in commission, and fuel for steamers." Now, it seems to me that, at least, we might have a separate estimate of what the fuel for our steamers would cost; that we might be informed by some persons connected with the Navy Department how much fuel our war steamers consume, and how much we should appropriate to purchase it.

Again: there is the clause "for the purchase of hemp." I think we might have information as to how much of this appropriation is to be applied to the purchase of that article.

I object to this system which has grown up, of grouping a great many objects together, no way congruous to one another, and appropriating a large sum of money in general terms, which, in fact, amounts to no more nor less than allowing the heads of bureaus to expend the money for such objects as they may please.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman from North Carolina takes exception to this item of $2,850,000 on account of the appropriation not being sufficiently stated in detail. The chief part of this appropriation of two million and odd dollars is consumed in the reconstruction of ships which, perhaps, in less than two years will be otherwise entirely useless.

The Secretary of the Navy has again and again urged upon Congress the policy and expediency of constructing new vessels of a proper class; but up to this time Congress has pertinaciously refused to appropriate money to build steam vessels of a light draught, and has gone on, in the teeth of the recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy, and of all the officers of the Navy, and has appropriated money to reconstruct old sailing-vessels. Part of this appropriation is for that purpose.

Now, I wish to say in regard to the estimates, that the gentleman from North Carolina did not read the caption, which is a little fuller than what he did read. But the Secretary of the Navy has in his Department—as have all the other heads of Departments—everything that goes to make up this estimate. At the opening of the Congress, the book of estimates is laid upon the desk of every member; and it is the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the privilege of every member of Congress, to go to the Departments and examine into the details which make up the estimates. But to facilitate the transaction of business, it becomes necessary to condense them.

I will add that the Committee of Ways and Means have examined the details, and compared them with former estimates; and they have not recommended the appropriation of a single dollar, except the amount necessary to carry out the laws of Congress. The gentleman from North Carolina has had his book of estimates since the commencement of the session; and it was his privilege at any time to go to the Departments and examine the details of these estimates.

Mr. BRANCH. I understand that the very object of having the estimates laid before us is that they may be in a convenient and accessible form for each member to refer to without having the trouble of going to the Departments.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I would say to the gentleman that the present mode of preparing the estimates is in strict conformity with law. If the gentleman from North Carolina will modify the law, the Secretary will comply with it; but these estimates are in compliance with law.

Mr. BRANCH. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BOWIE. I offer the following amendment: For Fort Madison, in the harbor of Annapolis, $15,000, in aid of the national Naval School at that point.

Now, sir, that amendment is in order here; and it is in order everywhere, and at all times. It is for the protection of your great school of naval tactics. It is in order, because it proposes to supply a national want, and not a sectional one. It is something that appeals to the great heart of the nation. It is something that appeals to the patriotism of every man in the country, whether he comes from the North or the South, from the East or the West.

Now, sir, this Naval School at Annapolis happens to be in my congressional district. I take care of it for that reason, and also because it is a part of the glory of the great country in which I live. It belongs to you as well as to Maryland; and you are bound to provide for this great national defense. You may very well leave out some of the appropriations which have been rejected by Congress, but you cannot leave out this, because it is one of the great defenses of your capital. Every man who has read the history of the last war with Great Britain knows very well how the enemy insidiously attacked us. [Laughter.] Every man knows that they first attempted to come up the Potomac, but Fort Washington was in the way to blow up their ships, and they could not come up. Well, then they tried to go up to Baltimore, but Fort McHenry was in the way to blow them up, and they could not pass it. They landed three miles below it, and marched nine or ten miles to the city of Baltimore.

Suppose that a war were to take place to-morrow between this country and England: we all know that a treaty of alliance exists between England and France, and no man can doubt for a moment that those two countries would join in an invasive war against the United States of America. The truth is, that I want no alliance with any nation. I want the great progress of Democracy. [Laughter.] I do not mean Democracy, mind you, in the sense of sectionalism, or in the sense of mere partyism; but I mean that eternal Democracy which comes from a power higher even than conventions—the Democracy of the people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I propose the following amendment:

After line twenty-one insert as follows:

Provided, That there shall not be purchased any larger quantity of hemp of foreign growth for the use of the Navy than shall be required to meet the deficiency in the supply of the American article, as reported to the Navy Department from quarter to quarter, by the agents appointed to procure the article of American growth.

I will not detain the committee by any extended remarks. That proviso embodies the best plan I can devise to compel the execution of the existing law, according to its true spirit. Year after year, for a long series of years, it has been the effort of Congress to have the article of American water-rotted hemp used by the American Navy. Some cause continues to prevent our success. Upon examination in the Department during the week past, I ascertained that we had only been so far successful as to have secured the purchase of seventy-four tons of the American article for the use of the American Navy within the last five years. Now, sir, there are many constituents of my own who would supply the Department with American water-rotted hemp; indeed, one did make a contract with the Department for the supply of four hundred and fifty tons per annum of the American article; but the Department vacated that contract, and seems afterwards to have failed to procure any of the American article for national use. It will be perceived by the House at once, that the object of my amendment is to require American hemp to be purchased for the use of the American Navy, and to compel the Department to comply with the action of Congress.

A MEMBER. Provided the American article is as good.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It must be as good, for it will have to bear the same test. The existing law does not require that it shall be taken except when it bears the same test. My amendment is offered in good faith, and I trust it will meet the approbation of the committee.

Mr. BRANCH. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky by adding at the end, the following:

Provided, It can be purchased on as good terms, price and quality considered, as it can be gotten elsewhere.

It appears to me that this is a new feature of the protective system. I acknowledge, with the gentleman from Kentucky, that if we have the means within ourselves of supplying our ships with everything that is necessary, I should prefer that it should be done; but I gather from hearing the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky read, that if we pass a law to that effect it will place such restriction upon the Navy Department that they would be compelled to purchase their hemp without regard to price or quality. I think it would be placing the Government completely in the power of the hemp-growers. I gather from the amendment of the gentleman that there is not hemp enough of proper quality raised in the country to supply what the Navy needs. Then, if such be the fact, those who raise it would have it in their power to demand just such a price and to impose upon the country just such an article as they think fit. I certainly have no disposition to deprive the American hemp-growers of any advantage they can have consistent with the actual interest of the Government. If it can be purchased as good and at as good prices of them as it can be elsewhere, I am ready, so far as my vote is concerned, to accord to them that measure of protection; but I must protest against passing any law that will place the Government, as to price and quality, completely within the power of those who raise the article.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina, that I have no desire to produce any such result; but that, after repeated experiments, this is the only mode I can devise by which to get the American article procured for the American Navy at all. When I inform the gentleman that as early as 1850, the policy was adopted, as appears from your statute-book, to prefer American water-rotted hemp to the foreign article, if it can be procured on as good terms, and of as good quality, and that all we have been able to sell for the American Navy in the last five years is seventy-four tons, the gentleman will see the necessity of my amendment. It is not that our farmers do not produce the article, nor that they are unwilling; but the fault lies in the administration of the Navy Department. The object of my amendment is to let the Navy Department understand that under the existing law we intend to have the American article purchased for the American Navy, and that they shall not make contracts for the foreign article, unless a deficiency of the American article shall appear by regular quarterly reports from the agents of the Department, who may be sent among the hemp growers to procure our own article.

Mr. BRANCH. As I understand—for I desire information upon the subject—the Secretary of the Navy is to be required to purchase all the American hemp, before he is allowed to go elsewhere. If that is to be the requirement, what is there to prevent the dealers in American hemp from demanding just such prices as they think proper?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I say to the gentleman from North Carolina, that the existing law provides that the American hemp purchased for the use of the Navy shall bear the test now required by law. Both the quality and price are fixed by law. My amendment will not alter the law, except so far as to require the Secretary to execute the existing law. The price is specified in the law.

Mr. BRANCH. Is the price specified in the law above or below what good hemp can be purchased at elsewhere?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have not referred to the law, but my recollection is that the American article is to be procured by the Navy Department, if it can be procured at the price at which the Russian article rated for five years preceding the date of the law. I will say frankly to the gentleman, that the Russian article is now purchased in New York and Boston, and is probably furnished to the Government at some three or four dollars less, by the ton, than it was five years ago.

Mr. CLAY. If not too much trouble, I would ask my honorable colleague to refer to the law, so that we may be exactly informed on the subject.

Mr. CLEMENS. I have the law here.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia to read it.

Mr. CLEMENS. I find, by the first act passed, that the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to purchase or contract for hemp for a period not exceeding three years. By the act of May 9, 1848, the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to purchase hemp for a period not exceeding five years, and provided that the same can be had of equal quality with the best foreign hemp, at a price not exceeding the average price of said hemp for the last preceding five years.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The existing law does not allow them to make a contract, but requires the Department to go into the market overt to make purchases. I think that this provision was inserted in the Navy appropriation bill of 1851.

Mr. CLEMENS. I have found that law, and will read it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment has closed.

Mr. BOCK. Have I not a right to be heard in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman would be in order at the time the gentleman from Kentucky closed his speech in favor of his amendment, and before the amendment to the amendment was considered.

Mr. BOCK. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BRANCH. I thought that the gentleman from Kentucky accepted my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. BRANCH. Then I insist on a vote on my amendment.

Mr. CLEMENS. I desire to read the existing law for the information of the committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. I object. Let us get on with the bill. We understand the question.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BOCK. I claim the right now to be heard in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. There were five minutes of debate in explanation of the amendment, and not one word has been said in opposition to it; whereas the rule provides that five minutes shall be allowed in explanation of an amendment, and five minutes in opposition.

Mr. BURNETT. I understood that the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRANCH] was accepted by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. It was not accepted.

Mr. BURNETT. Then the gentleman from North Carolina spoke in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the ground of his decision. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] offered an amendment, and spoke five minutes in its favor. If the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOCK] had risen then, and before the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRANCH] was considered, he would have been entitled to speak five minutes in opposition. The Chair regards debate as being closed on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. The question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was taken; and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, as amended; and it was agreed to.

Mr. GROW. I move to reduce the appropriation in the following paragraph to $2,000,000:

"For increase, repair, armament, and equipment of the Navy, including the wear and tear of vessels in commission, fuel for steamers, and purchase of hemp for the Navy, $2,850,000."

At almost, or quite, every session that I have occupied a seat on this floor, reasons have been urged for the increase of the Navy. At one time it is one exigency, and at another time another and a different one. And thus, from year to year, has the Government been called upon to increase the Navy. We have doubled its expenses since 1844, and have added some new ships. The reason urged to-day is that difficulties have occurred in the Gulf of Mexico with the British cruisers. Whether the acts of those officers are to be sustained by the British Government, or not, is not yet known. Until it is, there is no more reason for our increasing the Navy than there has been for years past, for difficulties have occurred with different nations for a number of years past in the Gulf. We have had some difficulty with Spain. Since filibustering commenced upon Central America and Cuba, those difficulties have been more frequent. Yearly, every new occasion is seized upon and urged as a new reason why the expenses of this Government should be swelled to a larger amount. The professed Utah war was seized upon and made the ground for a demand upon the Government to add five new regiments to our standing Army, and thus make a permanent increase of that number, because, forsooth, there was a danger of war with the Mormons in Utah. But the latest news from there shows that there is no trouble with the Mormons. Now we are asked, because of some difficulties in the Gulf, to add to the Navy; and I apprehend, when we hear from England, that these troubles will be all settled. By reports from Utah it appears that we have no need for an addition to the Army, for no war exists; and commissioners can go to Utah, and establish a peace to-day without the assistance of a soldier.

But, as I said before, the Government is called upon, from session to session, to increase the force of its Navy and Army, in order to increase, to an enormous extent, its patronage and its power. It is against this general tendency that I object. A Government made great by lavish expenditures, and its great patronage and power, is not a Government in harmony with the genius of our institutions or the character of our people. While we have a mercantile marine larger in tonnage than any nation on the earth, why need we apprehend any danger from any foreign Power? True, our war Navy is small, but it was so in the last war, and yet we wrested the trident from the proud mistress of the seas while in our infancy, upon the bosom of the mighty deep. If collision comes, why cannot you convert your mercantile marine into a hostile force, as you did in 1812, and at a less expense than it would be to be constantly increasing the Navy? Rely upon the exigency of the hour, and the expenses of the Government will be far less by converting your private ships into a mighty armed force to meet the exigency when it arises. You need no navy to keep a hostile force from landing upon your shores; for on land we can bid defiance to the world in arms. We need a navy only to protect our commerce. But that is as safe to-day, under our marine power, as it was in 1812. The disparity between our Navy and that of England is no greater now than it was then. But we have gone on since 1844 increasing its expense from about six million dollars a year up to thirteen million. Thus are we swelling up these enormous expenses which are not to be controlled when once incurred. We go on increasing the expenses of Government and the taxes upon the people from year to year, and all the excuse we have in this case is that we fear a hostile force will land upon our shores.

Mr. COVODE. I oppose the amendment of my colleague from Pennsylvania, and I desire to reply to the remark of the gentleman that our Navy now compares as favorably with the English navy as it did at the time of the war of 1812. I desire to call attention to a fact which the gentleman from Pennsylvania and this House do not appear to know, and that is that Great Britain, at the close of the Crimean war, had in her service, in good repair, five hundred war steamers. In addition to that, she had the control of four hundred and fifty mail steamers, which she could call upon, for war purposes, at any time. She had, then, a war fleet of nine hundred and fifty vessels, fit for war at any time, while the United States has only twenty war steamers, eight of which are not in a condition to go out of harbor. Such is the comparative condition of the two countries, so far as the steamer force is concerned.

The British navy, in fact, has the control of the sea. Talk about fighting England with our Navy! If we fight England, her ships have got to come upon our coast. We cannot meet upon the high seas; for I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that we are not able to cope with such a navy with our insignificant force. England's mail steamers are organized into ninety-one lines running direct from England, and twenty-five lines running between foreign ports, in connection with them; and in addition to the nine hundred and fifty war and mail steamers, she has a merchant steam marine of over nine hundred and fifty vessels, making in all over one thousand nine hundred sea-going steamers.

Mr. WINSLOW. I move to amend the amendment by adding one dollar to the amount. I merely wish to state I think my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] is in error. The clause of the bill now under consideration is not a bill for the increase of the Navy, but it is the usual clause for the repair of the wear and tear of the Navy, and to render your vessels sea-worthy.

Mr. GROW. The word "increasing" is used in the very commencement of the clause.

Mr. WINSLOW. I so understand; but under this clause the authority is not given to the Secretary of the Navy to add new vessels. That authority is always conferred by express legislation. But he has authority, from time to time, to render sailing vessels into steam vessels. If you strike out this appropriation, you will throw many of your vessels entirely out of commission. There are only twenty-three vessels in commission in the United States, and if you reduce this appropriation you could not keep half of that fleet in a condition for sea-service.

I have in my hand some statements in regard to our Navy, showing its comparative condition in 1816, and in January, 1858. In 1816 we had forty-nine sail of vessels on the Atlantic sea-board and in commission in foreign service, of an aggregate tonnage of 30,000, and on the lakes twenty-five vessels of an aggregate tonnage of 17,000, making in all seventy-four vessels of 47,000 tons. The Navy then having been actively employed in the war with Great Britain, and subsequently in the Mediterranean, under Commodores Decatur and Bainbridge, against the Barbary pirates, was in efficient condition, and a large proportion of the vessels were in sea-going condition.

In 1858 we had seventy-seven sail of vessels of all descriptions and classes, including line-of-battle ships, frigates, sloops-of-war, store and receiving-ships, also including six new steam sloops-of-war on the stocks, with two line-of-battle ships also building, of an aggregate tonnage of 134,916. Of the battle-ships there are but two that could be sent to sea, namely, the Vermont and Ohio, and not without extensive repairs. The remainder all require thorough repair, at a large cost, and perhaps an alteration to heavy razeed frigates. Of the frigates, there are six in sea-worthy condition; and of the sloops-of-war, in sea-worthy condition, there are twenty-one; and of the brigs, three. The tonnage of these sea-worthy sailing vessels is 35,839. The tonnage of our steam navy is 47,067. The total tonnage of our steam navy and sailing vessels, then, is 82,906. The tonnage of our Navy in 1816 was 30,000. The increase, then, in forty-two years is 52,906 tons.

The tonnage of all our naval force, including that of the lakes, in 1816, was 47,000; and in January, 1858, it was 134,916; showing an increase of total tonnage in forty-two years of 87,916 tons.

The total tonnage of our commercial marine in 1816, was 850,000; in 1858, it is 5,000,000; showing an increase in forty-two years of 4,156,000 tons.

In 1816, we had seventy-four vessels of all classes; and in 1858, we had seventy-seven; being an increase of three.

In 1816, a large proportion of the Navy was not only in efficient condition, but in actual sea-service duty.

In 1858, there are in good, sea-worthy condition forty-eight sail of vessels; six new steam propeller sloops on the stocks and two new steam-propeller frigates—the Franklin and Stevens, war steamers—making in all fifty-six vessels. In commission, at sea, we have twenty-three vessels.

So that it appears that the total tonnage of the Navy has increased since 1816, while, numerically, the Navy stands, with regard to effective ships, nearly the same.

It will be seen that, independent of any extraordinary reasons for an increase of the naval force, it is demanded by the great expansion of our commercial marine; and to show the necessity, it is unnecessary to resort to other arguments. The bare statement of its condition is in itself an argument. But it is felt that, owing to the proceedings in the Gulf, and the aggressions on our ships and seamen by the petty Powers of Central America and Mexico and South America, we ought to have a large force in those seas. When this necessity was felt, we had no available force but the Water-Witch, Arctic, and Dolphin, mounting in all but seven or eight guns. The aggressions recently complained of are upon vessels owned by the northern States of the Union. It comes with ill grace from the Representative of the powerful State of Pennsylvania to oppose measures for the protection of the rights of her people and ship-owners.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I was sorry, Mr. Chairman, to hear my colleague oppose the appropriation in this bill, because, independently of any thing else, it is strikingly in contrast with the action of the last House of Representatives, of which he was a prominent and influential member. I have before me, not only the estimates of this year, but also those of last year, and I find that the clause in last year's bill contained the very same word, "increase," which seems now to provoke the apprehensions of my colleague. The estimate then was exactly the same as was then appropriated—$2,877,000. That sum was appropriated by the House of Representatives, being $27,000 more than is now asked for. Every gentleman ought to recognize the necessity of at least keeping the Navy now up to what it has been in years past. There may come a time, Mr. Chairman, and probably will within a few days, when, according to the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, this House may be asked to vote a sum of money for the purpose of effecting a real increase of the Navy. But when things wear, at least, a doubtful, if not a threatening aspect, and when no one who cares for the commerce of the country, or the character of the country, would want to see the Navy diminished, my colleague [Mr. Grow] proposes to strike $2,000,000 from the appropriation, leaving an insignificant, trifling, and nominal appropriation.

I regret, quite as much as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Winslow] does, that the objection should have come from a gentleman from my State—a State which has so much at stake, as well in commerce as in everything else that is protected by the Navy of the United States. If there had been a demand made to increase the usual appropriation, there might have been some excuse for my colleague. But the last week, nay, the last day, might have suggested to some gentleman the propriety of authorizing the officers of the Government, at their discretion, to use an increased amount. The amount estimated for is but the amount required in time of peace—an amount required to equip our Navy, so as that it may deserve the name of a navy. It is not to increase our Navy, though, if half what we hear be true, we may be required very shortly to increase it. I am sorry that any of my colleagues, members from a State which derives so much material aid and benefit from the protection of our Navy, should rise in his place and ask to strike out what is virtually the entire appropriation, so as to let our ships go to rot. What will be our Navy without ships in proper equipment and repair? A few years since, officers were dismissed because they had nothing to do, owing to the dilapidated state of the Navy. Then they wanted to do without men, and now it is sought to do without ships. I hope his amendment will be voted down, and that a sum corresponding to that demanded by the Secretary of the Navy will be appropriated.

Mr. WINSLOW. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. FENTON. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the twenty-first line:

Provided, That in case any person, while engaged on board of any vessel which may be built under the authority of this act, shall be disabled by wounds or otherwise, while in the line of his duty, and in the service of the United States, he shall be entitled to a pension, according to the nature or degree of his disability, to commence from the date of such disability, and continue during his natural life, or the continuance of his disability; the amount of said pension to be regulated according to existing pension laws. That the pensions which have been granted, or which may hereafter be granted, to officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, artificers, rangers, sea-fencibles, volunteers, express-riders, seamen, marines, pilots, engineers, firemen and coal-heavers, and other persons, in the land or naval service of the United States, disabled by wounds or other injuries received while in the line of their duty, shall be considered to commence from the time of their being so disabled; and the amount of pension to which said officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, artificers, rangers, sea-fencibles, volunteers, express-riders, seamen or marines, pilots, engineers, firemen and coal-heavers, and other persons, may be entitled, shall be regulated according to existing laws in relation to the pay of invalid pensioners: Provided, That the amount of pension which any persons above-named have received shall first be deducted from the pension to which he is entitled under this act. That in case of the death of any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, private, artificer, volunteer, express-rider, sea-fencible, pilot, seaman, marine, engineer, fireman or coal-heaver, or other person, mentioned in the first section of this act, before or after the passage thereof, the amount which may be due to such person under the provisions of this act shall be paid to his widow; and in case of her death, to his surviving child or children; and if none, then to the next of kin of the persons provided for by the first section of this act.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I rise to a point of order. This amendment proposes general legislation.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Chairman, it appears to me in order and entirely just, while we are preparing for the general defense, by extending our fortifications and increasing our Navy, to provide for those gallant men who have hitherto, in time of our country's greatest peril, defended its flag and maintained its honor.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order under existing laws.

Mr. SEWARD. I offer the following amendment:

To pay the contractors for building cisterns, erecting por-ticoes to commandant's house and officers' quarters, to complete poricoes on mess' quarters, pavement and curb for commandant's house and officers' quarters, at marine barracks, Pensacola, Florida, so as to fully complete said marine garrison, $16,800.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Is that in accordance with existing laws?

Mr. SEWARD. Yes, sir; the last Congress provided for the building of marine barracks at Pensacola, Florida. This is to complete the work. I understand that estimates for the work have been sent to the Navy Department. It can be done much cheaper by the present contractor than in any other way; and I think it politic for the amendment to be adopted, and the money to be appropriated now. I have got no interest in the matter, but I think it is right in itself, and ought to be voted in.

Mr. LETCHER. It strikes me that the better plan would be to get the estimates which are said to be at the Navy Department before we undertake to act upon them. It may very well follow that the Navy Department did not think it a matter of much interest, and therefore did not transmit the estimates here.

Mr. SEWARD. I have seen the communication of the gentleman having charge of the navy-yard at Pensacola; but I am not one of those who like to write private letters to the Departments. I think when the President of the United States sends his annual message to Congress, it is all that we have a right to attend to. Therefore, I did not put myself to the trouble of calling on the Department for information. I know this is right, and ought to be voted in.

Mr. LETCHER. Well; but it strikes me that it is the duty of the Secretary of the Navy, if such an appropriation as this is necessary, not to wait to be applied to for a letter on the subject.

Mr. WINSLOW. I understand that these estimates were furnished by the Navy Department to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SEWARD. I believe that is so.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I offer an amendment, in the clause providing for the Boston navy-yard, after the word "rope-walk," insert the words "machine shop and for," so that it will read:

For reservoirs, boiler-house, chimney and boilers at rope-walk machine-shop, and for altering tur-kettles, machinery and bobbins for rope-walk, machinery for machine-shop and foundry, extension of dry-dock, and repairs of all kinds, $203,500.

That does not increase the appropriation, but merely directs how a portion of it shall be applied.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I offer an amendment, in the clause in relation to the New York navy-yard, after the word "yard," insert the words "and filling in the new purchase," and strike out "$269,516," and insert in lieu thereof, "$320,166;" so that it will read:

For boiler-house and setting boilers, water pipes, drains, quay wall, sewer extended to quay wall, boiler to dredger, timber basin, repairs of oakum-shop, filling ponds in yard, filling in the new purchase, dredging channel and sews, piling site for marine barracks, machinery for machine-shop, boiler-shop, saw mill, foundry, smithery, and brass foundry, and repairs of all kinds, $320,166.

Mr. LEITER. I object to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is in order.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. If the gentleman from Ohio will listen to me for a few moments, he will not object, I am certain. The amendment adds $50,650 to the appropriation already in the bill for filling in the new purchase, which is indispensably necessary. The appropriation is recommended by the Department, and is accepted by the Committee of Ways and Means. The gentleman will find the recommendation in the book of estimates, page 233; and this is the precise amount recommended by the bureau.

The appropriation is necessary on the score of economy. Dirt for the filling in can now be had at a moderate price; but if the Government permits that which it can now get to be sold to private individuals, it will cost them at least one third, and perhaps one half, more hereafter. There is a scarcity of waste dirt for building purposes in the neighborhood. About half a mile from the place required to be filled in there is now a sufficient quantity of dirt for the purpose, but it is being exhausted every year by private individuals; and unless the Government takes it up now, the necessary material will cost at least one half more. It is, therefore, a matter of economy; it is recommended by the Department, and is essential. I hope that, as the Committee of Ways and Means approve the amendment, there will be no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the clause which has just been amended:

And the amount heretofore appropriated for the coal-house may be applied to the completion of the store-house.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to amend the clause in relation to the Philadelphia navy-yard by inserting between "shop" and "additional," the words "limits of the navy-yard," and by increasing the appropriation from $97,214 to $222,214, so that it will read:

For extending gun-carriage shop, limits of the navy-yard, additional story to plumber's shop, dredging channel and repairs of dredger, repairs of dry-dock, and repairs of all kinds, $222,214.

Mr. LETCHER. I raise a point of order upon that amendment. I want to know if there is any law for this purchase which the gentleman proposes to make?

Mr. FLORENCE. There is a law authorizing the purchase of the ground now occupied by the navy-yard.

Mr. LETCHER. That is a horse of another color, altogether.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire, in order to facilitate the purposes of the navy-yard at Philadelphia, to extend its limits.

Mr. LETCHER. Before my friend goes on, I hope the Chair will decide the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was only waiting to hear the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania with reference to there being any existing law authorizing the purchase. Unless the gentleman can point the Chair to such a law, the Chair must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. MILLSON. I offer the following amendment, to come in under the head of "Norfolk:"

For machinery and tools for new foundry and machine shop, $16,000.

Had it been understood that the naval appropriation bill would be taken up to-day, there would have been, I am informed, a communication received from the Navy Department asking for this appropriation; but as there is a very urgent necessity for it, I beg leave briefly to explain. The Department has just ordered the commencement of the construction of one of the engines for a sloop-of-war, ordered to be built by the last Congress, at the new foundry just completed at Norfolk, Virginia. It is only two or three days since a report has been received from the chief engineer, that, in order to be able to complete the engine for the ship, it will be necessary to procure additional tools and machinery, costing about sixteen thousand dollars. I have examined the detailed estimates at the bureau, and I do not remember the precise amount, but it is something near sixteen thousand dollars. The communication would have been forwarded from the Navy Department to have been acted on by the Committee of Ways and Means, if it had been anticipated that the naval appropriation bill would be taken up to-day. I know the fact, however, that these tools and machinery are necessary to complete the work which has been commenced.

The new foundry at that navy-yard has been lately finished, and it is, perhaps, the best in the United States. I have said the engine for the new steamer has been ordered to be constructed there, and unless provision is made for these new tools and machinery, it will be necessary to construct portions of the work at other foundries, and the cost of transportation will be nearly as much as the whole appropriation I have asked for; while those tools and machinery will be required at that foundry, within a very short time, for the construction of other work. It will, therefore, be a matter of economy to make the provision now; and I hope, after this brief explanation, there will be no difficulty in adopting the amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. All I have to say in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is simply this: the Department, as I have already said, have tried to reduce the estimates to as low a point as possible. They have not estimated for this work, although I understand they have estimated for everything which they consider necessary for the next fiscal year.

Mr. MILLSON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to explain?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. In a moment. I was proceeding to say that, after the Department had sent in the estimates, and placed them at as low a point as they felt themselves justified, the Committee of Ways and Means have felt themselves bound to cut down even those estimates as much as possible.

Mr. MILLSON. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it was only on Monday last that a report was received from the chief engineer stating these facts. It was not because they did not deem it necessary, that the Department failed to estimate for it. The Department knew it to be necessary. I give my personal assurance of that fact; but they failed to estimate because they were not then apprised of the tools and machinery necessary for the completion of that foundry and machine shop.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have no doubt that what the gentleman states is correct. We took these estimates as they were furnished to us. The Secretary of the Navy estimated for contingencies. If this does not fall within the class of contingencies estimated for—and I suppose perhaps it does not—the committee has heard the application of the gentleman for an appropriation of $16,000, and I wish to say that the only objection I can have to it is that we have not sufficient money in the Treasury to meet any expenses that are not absolutely necessary. I have no other objection.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I offer the following amendment to come in after the 139th line:

To continue or carry on the work as contemplated by the act approved January 28, 1837, authorizing the establishing a naval depot on Blythe Island, at Brunswick, on the coast of Georgia, $300,000.

This matter has been before the Naval Committee, and a bill has been reported to this House which has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the unanimous recommendation that the appropriation be made. At the last session of Congress a naval depot was established at Brunswick, Georgia, by, I believe, fifty-six majority, on a vote by yeas and nays, in this House, and by a vote in the Senate of more than two to one.

No estimates have been sent in from the Navy Department, for the reason that the purchase of the land had not been completed and the jurisdiction of the State of Georgia had not been ceded at the time the regular estimates of the Navy Department were made up. The House will see that they have already recognized the correctness of the appropriation by the provisions heretofore made, and it will be an economy of time by making the appropriation in this bill, and thus save the necessity of taking up the other bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

I thought we ought to have had $600,000; but, in consideration of the hardness of the times, the Naval Committee unanimously agreed to recommend an appropriation of $300,000. Purchase of the land has been completed; the title is good; jurisdiction of the State of Georgia has been ceded; and they are ready to go on with the work. I hope there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. I raise the point of order, that the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SEWARD. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question to be, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Pending the vote, by division,

Mr. SEWARD. I do not want to embarrass the committee; but I ask that we shall have a vote on the proposition when we go into the House. I withdraw my appeal.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to insert the following as a new paragraph:

For the completion of the marine hospital at Cincinnati, Ohio, $50,000.

Mr. LETCHER. I raise a point of order on that amendment. My point is, that it has no legitimate connection with this bill. This is a Navy appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to add the following to the paragraph for the Philadelphia navy-yard:

And to extend the advantages and use of the dry-dock by removing the wall to a line south of its present location, and to add to the railway, $150,000.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I make the point that that amendment is not in order, for the reason that it is not germane to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I hope objection will be withdrawn to this amendment. It is moved with a view to increase the facilities of the Philadelphia navy-yard.

Several MEMBERS. Order!

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. LETCHER. Here are sundry appropriations for Mare Island, California; and I would inquire of the gentleman from California whether that island is a part of the property which is now the subject of litigation and controversy? If it is, then it seems to me that the Government ought to make no further appropriation until that question as to the title is settled, so that we may know whether or not we are making improvements upon our own land.

Mr. SCOTT. In answer to the inquiry of my friend from Virginia, I will say that the title to Mare Island is vested in the United States. It was, I think, purchased from M. Vallejo in 1853. It is not a matter of controversy, and the Government has a clear and unquestionable title to the land and the improvements upon it.

Mr. WINSLOW. I move to insert the following:

And it is hereby provided that the compensation of the watchman employed at the United States observatory and hydrographical office shall be the same as that paid to the several watchmen employed in the Executive Departments of the Government.

I move the amendment in obedience to the recommendation of the Department. It only increases the salary $100, and does not increase the appropriation at all.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARNETT. I move to strike from the following paragraph "26," and in lieu thereof to insert "20:"

"For preparing for publication the American Nautical Almanac, $26,880."

I move this amendment in order to ask a question. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to the amount of this appropriation. It seems to me that $26,880 is a large amount to be appropriated for this purpose. I wish to know whether it is the same amount that was appropriated last year?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will answer the gentleman fully. Here are the items as published in the estimates:

Estimate of the amount required for the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859.
For salaries of computers.....	$16,250 00
For purchase of paper, printing, &c., in order to publish in the year 1859, the Nautical Almanac for the year 1862, and for occasional printing, stationery, books, binding, &c.....	3,630 00
For the twenty-four new planets discovered since 1849.....	3,000 00
For new planetary tables.....	1,000 00
For auxiliary tables.....	1,000 00
For extra editions of the volumes already published.....	800 00
Clerk.....	500 00
Contingent, including rent of office, fuel, servant hire, &c.....	700 00
	$25,880 00

Amount appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1858..... $26,880 00

The appropriation for the last year was precisely what is now asked to be appropriated.

Mr. GARNETT. It is desirable that in appropriating money, we should get a quid pro quo. Amongst the items, if I heard them correctly, is one for the discovery of new planets. I should like to know the basis according to which such work is valued? How much is each planet considered to be worth? It appears to me to be the most extraordinary item I ever heard of. For discovering twelve new planets, $3,000!

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It was deemed so well known, that no further notice than is mentioned has been taken of this item.

Mr. GARNETT. I confess that I was ignorant, and I am willing to be ignorant, and I know the House will excuse it when I am accompanied by the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES.] Here is an observatory which you have built; you provide instruments for it, and pay the clerks and watchmen, and everybody about it; and, finally, you make a special appropriation of $3,000 to pay for the discovery of new planets! I submit that such an appropriation ought not to be in this bill. And, then, $16,000 of this appropriation is to pay the computers. I ask who these computers are? Are they United States naval officers?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Some of them are. Mr. GARNETT. Then you were paying them two salaries.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Though officers of the Army or Navy, they are not, when employed on this service, paid one dollar as officers.

Mr. GARNETT. The gentleman says that some of them are officers. You make an appropriation here to pay all these officers, so that they must be receiving two salaries.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Officers of the Army or Navy are detailed for this duty whenever they are wanted and they can be spared from the service; but they are paid only one salary.

Mr. GARNETT. I am willing to pay for this Almanac; I am willing to pay for the paper, and the printing, as it is a scientific work, but I am not willing to pay $3,000 for the discovery of new planets. Nor am I willing to pay double salaries. The honor of discovering a new planet is enough, without any pay. And if we are to pay, I contend that it is an indignity to the planets to pay only $250 a piece for them. I move to strike out the $3,000 for the new planets.

Mr. LETCHER. I am a little astonished that my colleague should kick up such a rumpus about these planets. I should suppose that a gentleman in his condition would be willing to pay more than that for Venus alone. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I want to know if Venus is a new planet in Virginia? [Renewed laughter.]

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. GARNETT; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. STANTON. I move to strike out the whole clause in relation to the publication of the American Almanac. I understand that the Almanac is prepared by officers of the Government, who are paid regular salaries by the Government as such officers.

Mr. WINSLOW. The gentleman is mistaken. Most of them are not officers of the Government.

Mr. STANTON. If I am mistaken in that, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I move to substitute the word "four" for "five," in the two hundred and twentieth line, and to strike out the words "three hundred," in the two hundred and twenty-first line. I offer this amendment for the purpose of enabling me to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

I wish to inquire what he and the Administration, whose organ upon this floor he is, propose to do with these five new steam-sloops, when they shall have been constructed? Does not he know how nearly impossible it now is, and for a long time has been, to fill the crews of our ships of war already afloat, and in other respects prepared for service? and is he ignorant of the fact, that the party to which he belongs has procured the passage of a bill in the other branch of the Legislature, and which is now on the table of the Speaker of this House, calculated, if not intended, to destroy our chief source of supply of native seamen? Sir, it is a fact, well known and indisputable, that more than two thirds of the men who compose the crews of our Navy are foreigners, and that not less than three fourths of the sailors in our merchant marine are also of foreign birth; and even with this resource, it is with the greatest difficulty, and only after the most injurious delays and embarrassments, in many cases, that these branches of service can be supplied with adequate crews. I speak, not against foreigners, but of the difficulty of procuring seamen. Add to the number of vessels in the Navy, and this difficulty will be increased, and the disproportion between native and foreign-born seamen enlarged. I think I may say with entire safety that a majority of our native sailors commenced going to sea as fishermen. There are hundreds of bays, rivers, and creeks in Maine and New England whose banks are populated by a hardy, vigorous, and enterprising race of men, who employ a few months every year on fishing cruises; and from their ranks large numbers go annually into the merchant and naval service of the country. Repeal the fishing bounty, as you propose to do, and you strike every fishing smack from the ocean at a single blow; for nothing is better established than the fact, that, with the odds which exist against us since the reciprocity treaty, the fishing business cannot be sustained for a week without the bounty. I am no advocate for bounties of this kind, when they look only to fostering a branch of industry for its own sake; but when by them you can secure strength to an important arm of the national defense, and accomplish a great national object, not otherwise to be accomplished, I hold it to be within the scope of our power, and in the direct line of wisdom and duty, to grant them. In this case, your ability to man the ships of war you already possess, to say nothing of those you contemplate building, depends upon the preservation of our fisheries. Yet you are prepared to destroy them at the same time that you call for more ships. To build ships when you have not sailors to make up their crews, would be as wise as to build barns where there are no harvests, school-houses where there are no scholars, churches where there are no people, to buy lamps when you have no oil. Before we spend millions of dollars in constructing sloops and frigates, I think it would be wise to learn whether our only school for sailors is to be broken up. It may be the policy of the Administration to provide for these vast expenditures without knowing or inquiring whether they can be of any service to the country; it may desire authority to make contracts, involving the outlay of millions, as a basis of reserves and contributions, to be used for the purpose of increasing its power and prolonging its existence. But that such a use of the people's money by the Administration will be approved by the country, when it is seen to be the tendency of a part of its policy to impair the efficiency of the nation's defenses, if not wholly to destroy the prestige of its flag, may be more than doubted.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Mr. Chairman, I should not have responded to the gentleman from Maine, if he had not made an inquiry of me. I have always understood that it was the duty of the Government to raise money to buy ships; but I never knew, until the gentleman from Maine put his query to me, that it was part of the business of the Government to buy men, or to furnish money to buy men.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. No, sir; the gentleman refused to yield to me.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I wanted to know what the Administration has been doing all this session but buying men. [Laughter.]

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have an amendment which I desire to propose.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman from Maine cannot withdraw his amendment without my consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the objection to the withdrawal comes too late.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I was on the floor answering the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had resumed his seat, and no objection was interposed to the withdrawal of the amendment.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I offer the following amendment:

And to enable the Secretary of the Navy to cause to be constructed, without unreasonable delay, by contract or in the navy yards of the Government, as he may consider most advisable, ten small screw-propeller sloops-of-war or dispatch vessels, with full steam power, and with a draught of water not to exceed twelve feet; said vessels to be constructed, armed, and equipped, with reference to speed as dispatch vessels and efficiency as war steamers, $2,500,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rise to a question of order. There is no law authorizing the construction of these steamers, and independent legislation is not in order in an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order well taken.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late to appeal. Mr. BOCKOCK. The Chair carries things with a high hand.

The amendment of Mr. STEPHENS was read, as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to pay the salary of Professor James P. Espy, $3,000; the payment to be made in the same manner, and under his control, as former appropriations for meteorological operations.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I rise to a question of order. I think that is clearly a private claim, and is not in order as an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is not a claim at all. It is the usual salary that has been paid for the last ten years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Georgia if the payment of this salary is authorized by an existing law?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is authorized by every appropriation bill for the last ten years, except one, and in that case it was paid afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Georgia can refer the Chair to any law authorizing the appropriation, the Chair will hold the amendment to be in order; otherwise the Chair is of opinion that it is not in order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman from Georgia refers the Chair to every appropriation bill for the last ten years, except one. At the first session of the last Congress the appropriation was omitted, but it was made at the second session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair considers that the amendment is not in order under the 81st rule.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It has been uniformly offered in the same way.

The CHAIRMAN. It may have been offered and entertained by unanimous consent, but the point of order is made now, and the Chair feels bound to rule it out of order, unless the gentleman can show that there is some law authorizing it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It has uniformly been provided for by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment out of order. He is constrained to do so under the 81st rule.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair; and state as the ground of my appeal, that this has been uniformly voted, in precisely this way, for the last ten years.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was taken; and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. FLORENCE. I now offer the following as an additional section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That to enable the Secretary of the Navy to cause to be constructed, without unreasonable delay, by contract, or in the navy-yards of the Government, as he may consider most desirable, ten small screw-propellers, sloops-of-war or dispatch vessels, with full steam power, and with a draught of water not to exceed twelve feet, said vessels to be constructed, armed, and equipped, with reference to speed as dispatch vessels and efficiency as war steamers, the sum of $2,500,000 is hereby appropriated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I raise the question that that amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the amendment not to be in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I insist that it is in order, under the existing laws authorizing the establishment of a navy. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. FLORENCE. I do appeal from the decision of the Chair; and call for tellers upon the appeal.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ADRAIN and BOFFINTON were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes eighty; a further count not being demanded.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendments, of which I gave notice, to come in at the end of the bill:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to pay for the publication of the code of regulations for the government of the Navy, as directed in the second section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1858," approved March 3, 1857, $3,000.

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to pay the expenses of the courts of inquiry to investigate the cases of certain officers affected by the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy in respect to dropped and retired naval officers,'" approved January 14, 1857, $110,000.

For the completion of the publication of the charts of the late expedition for the exploration of the river La Plata and its tributaries, $5,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I call for separate votes upon the various propositions.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. As separate votes have been called upon the several items, I propose to send up and have read a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, explaining the several items. The letter was read, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 13, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to two omissions in the naval appropriation bill passed at the last session of Congress.

The seventh section of that act (page 247, pamphlet edition of laws, third session Thirty-Fourth Congress) directed the Secretary of the Navy to have prepared, and report to Congress at its present session, for approval, a code of regulations for the government of the Navy. The code has been prepared, and is under revision; and it is contemplated to submit it to Congress at this session. It has necessarily involved expenses amounting to about three thousand dollars, for which no appropriation was made.

The act of the 16th of January, 1857 (pages 153 and 154, pamphlet edition of laws above referred to) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy,'" required the organization of courts of inquiry to investigate the cases of certain officers affected by the act of which it was amendatory; and the operation of the act first referred to was limited to one year from its passage. The courts of inquiry have been had, and the results reported. Expenses amounting to about one hundred and ten thousand dollars were necessarily incurred for this purpose, for which no appropriation was made.

I respectfully request that the necessary appropriations be made for these purposes.

There was evidently another omission in the naval appropriation bill passed at the last session. The sum of $5,760 had been asked by the Department for preparing for publication the surveys of the late expedition to the North Pacific and Behring's Straits, and $5,000 for finishing those of the late expedition for the exploration and survey of the river La Plata and its tributaries. Though the act making the appropriation specified it to be for both subjects, and the discussion on the bill indicated that it was so considered by Congress, yet, as the sum appropriated was the exact amount estimated for the first named object, it has been applied to it; and the work last specified has been delayed.

I would therefore suggest that the sum of $5,000 be appropriated "for completing the publication of the charts of the late expedition for the exploration of the river La Plata and its tributaries."

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ISAAC TOUCEY.

Hon. J. GLANCY JONES, Chairman Committee Ways and Means, House Representatives.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have a few words to say, which will apply to the three amendments. The act of 1857 provided for the code mentioned, and it now requires $3,000 to pay for it. The second amendment is an appropriation of $110,000 to pay for the courts of inquiry. Every gentleman is acquainted with the necessity for this appropriation. These courts of inquiry have been held during the last year, trying the cases of dropped and furloughed and other officers, who had the right of appeal under act of Congress of the preceding session. This money is for the expenses of those courts.

The third amendment is to pay for charts of the exploration of the river La Plata. It is proposed to print them for the use of our commerce. It is known that a small steamer, under Captain Page, was sent out for the survey of that river. Our commerce is steadily growing in that quarter. Unless, however, these charts are published, the survey will be of little good to our mariners. The appropriation is barely sufficient. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection to the first two, but I have to the last amendment. I ask that there shall be a separate vote on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the vote will be taken on the amendments separately.

Mr. CURTIS. I will speak to the third amendment while I am up, which proposes to appropriate $5,000 for the publication of charts of the survey of the Rio de la Plata.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that one of our national vessels (the Water Witch) was sent to South America to survey one of the rivers of that country. But why should our vessels be sent to South America to survey rivers there, while the rivers of our own country remain unsurveyed and unexplored? Now that the La Plata, a river far beyond our dominions, has been surveyed, why should we go to the expense of publishing charts of the survey? It is a river entirely beyond our reach, and thousands of miles south of the Isthmus. It is a river no more connected with the commerce of the high seas than the Mississippi or the Danube; and, sir, our Navy has no more to do with it than they have with a river of France. The mouth of the La Plata is thirty-five degrees of latitude south of the equator, and therefore seventy-three degrees south of this capital. What have we to do with the interior rivers of a country so remote and so disconnected from our territory?

It is true that we have sent a national vessel there. Twenty-five thousand dollars were appropriated last year "to complete the explorations of the Parana and the tributaries of the Paraguay, and it is now proposed perhaps to get up a book relating to the explorations of these rivers, as we have had volumes published concerning other rivers in South America. I am opposed to all such appropriations, and especially to the first step. That very survey of the La Plata and its tributaries has involved us in difficulty with the Republic of Paraguay, which may result in a remote, expensive, and vexatious war. The intention of our vessel to proceed up the eastern branch of La Plata, the Parana, was opposed by Paraguay; but the vessel determined to carry out the survey, and, persisting against remonstrance, was fired upon from a Paraguayan fort; and I see that it is proposed to empower the President of the United States to send armed vessels there to avenge that assault upon our vessel. In the mean time, we are called on to publish charts of their rivers, while we have no access to, or commerce on, their waters. The whole thing appears to me wrong, and I hope the amendment will not pass.

The question was taken on the first amendment; and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on the second amendment, as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to pay the expenses of the courts of inquiry to investigate the cases of certain officers affected by an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy,'" in respect to dropped and retired naval officers, approved 16th of January, 1857, $110,000.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on the third amendment, as follows:

For the completion of the publication of the charts of the late expedition for the exploration of the river La Plata and its tributaries, $5,000.

Mr. NICHOLS. I move to increase that appropriation one dollar, and I do it for the purpose of making a suggestion to my friend from Iowa, [Mr. CURTIS.] I am in favor of printing these charts. He asks what was the object of the survey? I answer that we have the same object in the exploration of that river, that we had in the exploration of the Amazon and other South American rivers. If the gentleman has examined the results of those explorations upon that continent, he cannot fail to see their great benefit to our people. The survey of the Amazon was made some years ago, and the results were published to the country; and a mercantile friend of mine from New York, told me some weeks since, that from information he had obtained, there had grown up with the countries explored by that expedition, and in consequence of the facilities furnished by the publications of the Government, a trade now amounting to some two or three million dollars annually.

Let me say another thing in answer to the gentleman. This survey proceeded with the knowledge and by consent of the South American States within whose jurisdiction it was proposed to carry it on; and passports were furnished by those Governments to our officers who were engaged in it. It was proposed to make a contribution to knowledge, for the enterprise of our own people, which, if left to the inactivity of those Governments themselves, would have never been afforded. Whatever the result may have been; whatever misunderstandings and difficulties may have occurred, my information is that the survey proceeded with the consent of the South American Governments.

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman is mistaken in regard to the assent of the Government having been given to this survey.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am very anxious to get through with this bill, and I must insist that the gentleman shall confine his remarks to the question under consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. I will proceed in order; but I desire to reply to the remark that we had the assent of the Government to make the survey of the La Plata and its tributaries, the Paraguay and Parana. It was the want of that assent that caused the difficulty with the authorities of Paraguay.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Does not the gentleman from Iowa understand that the Argentine Republic has conferred fluvial liberty upon the world, as to all the rivers of South America within that Confederation?

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman does not understand me. The difficulty is not with the Argentine Republic. Paraguay is one of the independent States of South America, and the Paraguay and Parana rivers are the common boundaries between this Republic and different States of the Argentine Confederation. Paraguay never gave her consent. On the contrary, the Government refused it, and endeavored to prevent it by firing upon our ship. Paraguay is not one of the Argentine States.

I wish to say, also, that this idea of my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. NICHOLS] of conveying knowledge of that river to the world, would perhaps be well conceived if we had first surveyed our own rivers. Here, in our own great Northwest, is the Red River of the North, a great river, upon which our settlements are gathering, and you do not know whether it is navigable or not. There is also the Yellow Stone, Columbia, and other rivers, of our own country, that have not been surveyed, and their surrounding country is unknown. There is, also, the Colorado of the South, connecting with a great gulf of the Pacific, and extending thousands of miles in our interior, which has not been surveyed, although some efforts are now being made to that effect. While we have thus neglected to survey our own rivers, how preposterous and absurd to send vessels to South America, for the purpose of getting knowledge of her rivers for the benefit of the world! I submit my remonstrance against this and all other attempts to develop South America, while this, our own great continent is unexplored and undeveloped.

The amendment to reduce the appropriation one dollar was withdrawn.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. BOWIE. I move to add the following amendment:

For Fort Madison, $15,000, in aid of the United States Naval School at Annapolis.

I desire to speak in favor of my amendment, and I mean to speak in a sense, and in a way, that will touch the heart of every true patriot. I have offered this amendment to protect the national Naval School at Annapolis, where the midshipmen who are sent into the Navy to command our ships of war, are educated. Mr. Chairman, I want to build up a wall around the great national principle of patriotism, [laughter,] whether it be among the old Federalists or Democrats. I am for protecting my own native country, and the flag that flies over us; I am for sustaining that. But that is immaterial to this amendment, which is to appropriate $15,000 for Fort Madison, which guards the approach to the Naval School, situated at Annapolis. I find in a report made on the 24th day of November, 1857, that Captain Meigs states that $15,000 has been appropriated by Congress, and that up to that time it was unexpended.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am opposed to the amendment, and ask that the question be taken on it.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, MAY 28, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 152.

VOLUNTEER APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to take up the bill making appropriations for the support of three regiments of volunteers authorized by the act of Congress, approved 7th of April, 1858.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. QUITMAN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by clauses, for amendment.

Mr. STANTON. As I understand it, the bill is now open for general debate. I do not propose to debate it; but I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether the three regiments have been ordered out; and, if not, whether it is the expectation of the Administration to order them out?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The regiments have not been ordered out, and it is not the intention of the Executive to order them out until an appropriation is made by law to pay for maintaining them. Nor is it the intention of the Secretary of War to call them out then, unless it becomes necessary to prosecute the war now pending. If peace should be restored in Utah they will not be called out, even if the appropriation be made.

The regiment for Texas will be wanted in any event. But a proposition would have been made to strike out two thirds of the appropriation if sufficient intelligence had been received at the Department to justify the Secretary of War in the belief that the other regiments would not be required. I have only to add, that, if the appropriation be now made, the regiments will not be called out unless they are absolutely required.

Mr. STANTON. I trust the committee will not report this bill to the House now. It is evidently a question for the House to determine as to when a necessity exists for calling out these regiments, although they may have been authorized. It seems to me that it is a matter which it is the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs, and of every member of the House, to inquire into, as to whether the present relations of the country with Utah Territory require it. I do not understand that any gentleman here is now thoroughly acquainted with the condition of things, or that the House can act understandingly about it. Some little time ought to be allowed to intervene, so that the subject may be investigated. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will lay this bill aside, and take up another bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If it is the inclination of the committee to lay the bill aside, I shall interpose no objection. I have brought it up at the solicitation of a number of gentlemen, and in obedience to what I supposed was the will of Congress, which recently passed a law authorizing the regiments. But, as objection is made to the consideration of the bill now, and especially as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has made a motion that the committee rise, I am willing that the bill shall be laid aside and another one taken up.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill will be laid aside.

Mr. FLORENCE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question will be submitted to the committee.

The question was taken; and the bill was laid aside.

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to take up the bill making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will briefly explain the objects of the bill. Prior to 1849, the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs were deducted from the receipts, and the balance paid into the Treasury. The act of 1849 provided that the whole amount of revenue collected should be paid into the Treasury, without any abatement. The act of 1850 excepted from the operation of that law the Pacific coast. The Secretary of the Treasury has recommended in his report, and this bill provides for, the repeal of the act of 1850, so as to put the collection of revenue upon the Pacific coast upon precisely the same basis as the collection of revenue in other parts of the country. The effect of this bill will be simply to repeal the act of 1850, and make the system uniform throughout the country, so that all the revenue collected will be paid into the Treasury without any abatement; and the bill appropriates the sum of $4,000,000, as a permanent fund for the collection of the revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will now be read by sections, for amendment.

While the Clerk was reading the first section, Mr. BOWIE proposed to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland will suspend until the Clerk has finished reading the section.

Mr. BOWIE. No, sir; I propose to offer my amendment now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is not in order until the section shall have been read.

Mr. BOWIE. I insist to offer my amendment now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is not in order. The Clerk will proceed to read the section.

Mr. BOWIE. I offer my amendment right at that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland will resume his seat.

Mr. BOWIE. I will resume my seat when I am decided to be out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already decided the gentleman out of order.

Mr. BOWIE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot appeal while the section is being read.

Mr. BOWIE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is out of order, and will take his seat. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the section.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman (Mr. SICKLES) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 466) making appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, and having been interrupted in its proceedings, had directed him to report the facts to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs attention to the 76th page of the Manual, which says:

"If repeated calls do not produce order, the Speaker may call by his name any member obstinately persisting in irregularity; whereupon the House may require the member to withdraw. He is then to be heard in exculpation and to withdraw. The Speaker states the offense committed; and the House considers the degree of punishment they will inflict."

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee. I demand tellers on the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON and RUSSELL were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-two; a further count not being demanded.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SICKLES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury be read.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 6, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your letter of the 2d instant, asking on what data the probable amount of $4,000,000 will be required to meet the expenses of collecting the customs for the fiscal year from July 1, 1858, to June 30, 1859; and in reply beg leave to refer to the explanation contained in my annual report on this subject, commencing on page 10 of the printed copy, and to the statements of the Register accompanying the report, which are printed on the 40th page.

It appears from these statements, that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, the expenditures for this purpose, including the Pacific coast, amounted, within a fraction, to three million seven hundred thousand dollars, and, for the reasons stated in the report, an increased expenditure under this head, to some extent, may be necessary. Upon these data the estimate of $4,000,000 was founded.

You also ask the probable amount receivable from storage, cartage, drayage, and labor for the half year, from January 1, 1858, to July 1, 1858, and for the fiscal year 1859.

It is not easy to conjecture what amount will be received during the current half year, or the next fiscal year, from storage. It will be very small, as all the public stores have been given up, excepting one at Boston and one at San Francisco. Storage is no longer charged by the United States at any other than these two ports, and comparatively in few cases at them.

Whatever amount may be received from storage, it should be placed directly into the Treasury, as a miscellaneous receipt, instead of being carried to the credit of the appropriation for expenses of collecting the customs, as was provided by the joint resolution of February 14, 1850, which provision will be abrogated whenever Congress shall act on the subject. At that time an extensive system of public storage was in operation, which has since been changed for private bonded warehouses. It will now be best to have the small sum realized from storage at the two public stores mentioned, disconnected from the appropriation, and placed in the Treasury as a specific payment on public account.

No revenue is derived from cartage, drayage, labor, or other necessary charges for moving merchandise in bond. These expenses are, in the first instance, paid out of the appropriation for collecting the revenue, and are refunded by the owner of the merchandise when it is entered for withdrawal or consumption. The amount expended is required to be restored, and should be carried to the credit of the appropriation from which it was taken. The answer to your inquiry in regard to the probable amount receivable from cartage, drayage, and labor from any given period, is, therefore, precisely the sum previously expended from the appropriation for these purposes.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
HOWELL COBB,
Secretary of the Treasury.
Hon. J. GLANCY JONES, Chairman of Committee Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

Mr. COLFAX. I move to reduce the appropriation from $4,000,000 to $3,000,000; and I do so for the purpose of saying a few words on this branch of the expenses of the Government. It is true that we have built a large number of custom-houses; and it is true, too, that the expenses of collecting the revenue must necessarily be larger now than they were a few years ago. Lately our revenue has rapidly fallen off, and there ought to be retrenchment in all branches of the Government. It does seem to me that when we collect less than forty million dollars of revenue under the tariff, as is the case this year, it ought not to cost us ten per cent. for merely collecting it. I know that custom-houses must be kept up; I know that the leading officers must be retained; yet is there not some place, amongst the thousands of their subordinates, where retrenchment could be made? Are there not some officers who could be dispensed with? I would ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether there has been any attempt on their part to retrench the expenditures for collecting the revenue in any particular whatever? My question is a sincere one, prompted by a desire to ascertain what are the facts.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It affords me great pleasure to reply to the gentleman so far as I am informed on the subject. There is no expense now incurred in collecting the revenue, except under existing law. Every officer connected with the revenue has his salary regulated under that law. It is not within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, unless authorized by Congress, to deduct a cent from the salaries of these officers; and to enable him to execute the law, precisely this sum of $4,000,000 will be required.

It is supposed that there will be a revival of trade during the next fiscal year, and that the receipts will be equal to the expenditures of the Government. The present disturbance of our finances is believed to be temporary, and that it will soon pass away.

I have made every effort within my power, wherever practicable, and no serious loss was to result to the country, to cut down the expenditures of the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury has made every effort to retrench the expenditures of the Government, and he is doing so still; and I do not think that he has received the credit which his praiseworthy efforts so richly merit. There has been a system of lavish expenditure commenced under a plethoric Treasury. Congress adjourned last year with a surplus of $30,000,000 in the Treasury. The idea throughout the country was that there should be expenditure in every branch of the public service, in order to prevent the accumulation of the gold and silver of the country in the Treasury. A sudden financial crisis came, and has arrested everything. The Secretary has retrenched as far as he could. The Committee of Ways and Means have retrenched as far as they could. To retrench further, the only way is to repeal the law authorizing the expenditures that it is proposed to cut off.

Mr. COLFAX. I have listened to the gentleman with much pleasure. But I have found, by reference to past Administrations, that never before has there been appropriated $4,000,000 for collecting the revenue in one single year. Am I not correct?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Under the charters of the Bank of the United States, passed in 1811 and in 1817, a provision was incorporated providing that the money of the United States should be deposited in the United States Bank and its branches, and that it should be disbursed free of cost to the Government. Prior to 1849, the collectors of the revenue deducted the amount of their fees before they paid the balance into the Treasury. Under the Sub-Treasury act, passed in 1846, the Treasurer of the United States and assistant treasurers received in gold and silver the revenues collected for the Government. Under that system, from 1846 to 1849, the old system of deducting the amount of fees from the amount collected, and of paying in only the balance, continued. In 1849 a law was passed requiring the payment of the whole amount into the Treasury. Then an appropriation would be made of a sufficient sum out of the Treasury to pay the expenses of collecting. In 1850, the Representatives from California, for reasons given at that time, asked that California might be excepted from the operation of that rule, and the act of 1850 was passed exempting them from that rule. The Secretary of the Treasury asks that it may be made uniform throughout the country. The cost during the last year, according to my recollection, was $3,000,000, and to that is now to be added the amount for the charge upon the Pacific coast. The gentleman will find that by adding the amount heretofore deducted for the Pacific coast, to the amount of $2,800,000, the cost of last year, it will require about four million dollars for the service for the next fiscal year.

I will remark, further, that not one dollar can go out of the Treasury except in pursuance of existing law; and that the remedy, if any is needed, is by changing the laws, and not by voting down this bill.

Mr. COLFAX. I am not proposing to vote down this bill, nor do I desire to do it if it can be properly amended. I only wish to reduce its amount. If I am correct in my understanding of the matter, the average expense of collecting the revenue in 1850, only eight years ago, was but $2,000,000. Of late, it has been, so far as the Atlantic and Gulf coast is concerned, about three million dollars; and I understand the expenses of collection in California were about four hundred and forty thousand dollars. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct as to the expense of collecting that revenue there for the last year, still the appropriation contained in this bill for the next year should not exceed three million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, or, under the present reduced revenue, not over three million dollars, the amount I have moved. It is true that new collection districts have been established, and new offices opened; yet I do contend, sincerely and honestly, and with no desire to embarrass the Committee of Ways and Means, that, when our revenue has diminished, as it has, and as it must for some time to come, we should cut our garments according to our cloth. We should endeavor to diminish our expenses in every possible way. If we have placed men in the service, even temporarily, when they are not now needed, the Secretary of the Treasury ought to make a reduction of force under a rigorous system of retrenchment; and if he does not do so, the Committee of Ways and Means and this House should assume the responsibility of compelling that retrenchment by limiting and reducing the appropriations.

Under our present tariff, the amount we receive per cent, upon imports has run down from twenty-five to nineteen, on an average. The same amount of goods which, under the previous tariff, would have given us $60,000,000, will now give us but about forty-five million dollars. I do not believe that the revenue under the present tariff, even with the revival of business which the gentleman from Pennsylvania expects, will amount to more than forty-five million dollars for the next fiscal year. And yet we are asked to appropriate $4,000,000 to collect that amount. It does seem to me that the Committee of Ways and Means should aid in reducing this expense; but instead of that, they demand a larger sum than has ever before been asked for, for the collection of the revenue.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Will the gentleman strike out of an appropriation bill money due to any officer created by law, and whose salary is fixed by law?

Mr. COLFAX. No, sir; but I say to the gentleman that this is not a bill for the past, but for the next fiscal year.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I may concur with the gentleman in what he says in regard to the expense of collecting the revenue, but the difficulty is, the gentleman does not commence in the right way. The reform should begin by repealing or changing the laws. You should ask the Secretary of the Treasury to lend his assistance, to point out the evils, to show us where reductions could be made, and to give us information generally about the matter. What I object to is, after an office is created and a salary fixed, your refusing to appropriate the money in an appropriation bill. Introduce your reforms, and I will go with you.

Mr. COLFAX. I will give two answers to the gentleman's remarks. In the first place, if I were to propose a reform upon an appropriation bill, the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be the first one to arrest my progress, and have me ruled out of order. In the second place, the Secretary of the Treasury, the man at the head of the finances of the Government should, himself, recommend retrenchment to Congress, and carry it out to the fullest extent of his power, in reducing the number of subordinates, who could now be dispensed with in the present condition of our revenue. He can look over the whole country, and see where retrenchment can be best effected. If it escapes his watchful eye, then let the Committee of Ways and Means, who are charged with the duty of keeping our appropriations within our resources, initiate this reform themselves, and if they will not, then let this House take the responsibility of arresting these extravagant expenditures themselves.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Well, I will compromise with my friend by taking the vote upon the amendment.

Mr. GARNETT. I move to amend by adding a section which I think will meet the approbation of both the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Indiana. It is as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to the next session of Congress a plan and estimates for reducing the expenses of the collection of the revenue, in accordance with the general recommendations of his last annual report.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have no objection to that amendment, and hope it will be agreed to by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COLFAX. After a vote has been taken on my amendment, I will with great pleasure vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, with the single remark that considering the condition that the Treasury has been in for the last six or eight months, I think it is rather late in the day for the Secretary of the Treasury to be called upon to submit a plan for retrenchment some six or eight months hereafter.

Mr. GARNETT. I desire to have an extract read from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury which, I think, will convince every one that the fault does not rest with the Secretary, but with this extravagant Congress—extravagant on all sides, Democratic and Republican.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is not an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, and the gentleman had better waive it until the vote shall have been taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GARNETT. Very well, sir; I will do so.

Mr. COLFAX. I wish to say but a word or two further. The amount heretofore appropriated was $2,450,000 for the Atlantic coast, and $440,000 for the Pacific coast, making only about three million dollars, in all. This is an increase of $1,000,000 over the amount that has been heretofore appropriated.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It has cost the sum of $1,250,000 for the collection of the revenue on the Pacific coast, which has been abated heretofore, but it will now come into the Treasury. I hope my friend from Virginia will not insist on the reading of the report, but that we shall have a vote.

Mr. GARNETT. Very well, sir.

Mr. COLFAX's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARNETT. I now offer my amendment.

Mr. FLORENCE. I submit the point of order that that amendment is not authorized by existing law; it is legislation.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I hope no question of order will be made on it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I appeal to my colleague to withdraw it.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, I will not press the question of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now move to take up the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

The motion was agreed to, and the first reading of the bill dispensed with by unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Chairman, both Houses of Congress adopted a resolution that they would adjourn their respective Houses on the 7th of June next. I saw no good reason for adopting that resolution at the time it was introduced. I think it was exceedingly precipitate, and I do not think the House will atone much for its precipitancy by undertaking to dispatch the business of Congress at railroad speed. I do not think the bills we are called upon to consider at this late hour of the day can be considered with that degree of care—

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. What amendment does the gentleman propose?

Mr. MILLSON. I have offered no amendment. The bill is open to general debate, and I have a right to speak about Kansas if I think proper, or upon any other topic. I say that I see no necessity for taking up these bills, and passing upon them, important, as they undoubtedly are, without that degree of deliberation which ought to be bestowed upon them by the Congress of the United States. It is a poor excuse to say that we have determined to adjourn on the 7th of June, and that we will, therefore, dispatch the public business without due consideration. I think, Mr. Chairman, that there is greater necessity for adjourning every day at four or five o'clock than there is for adjourning on the 7th of June. I am willing to stay here till the 7th of August, or the 7th of September, if necessary; but I am not willing that the House shall remain in session—such few members as choose to remain—until these late hours, and give to the public business that sort of consideration which has been given to the bills that have been before us this evening. I therefore move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by sections, for amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to amend the second section of the bill by striking out the words "that if the revenues of the Post Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations of this act," and inserting in lieu thereof:

That as the revenue of the Post Office Department will be insufficient to meet the appropriations of this act, the three-cent rate of postage is hereby increased to five cents, to take effect on the 1st day of August next, and in case there shall be a deficiency."

So that it will read:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That as the revenue of the Post Office Department will be insufficient to meet the appropriations of this act, the three-cent rate of postage is hereby increased to five cents, to take effect on the first day of August next, and in case there shall be a deficiency, then the sum of $3,500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the revenue of the Post Office Department for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

Mr. ENGLISH. I raise a question of order on that; it proposes to change the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the Chair will allow me to state why I think it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be very happy to hear the gentleman.

Mr. LETCHER. This bill is to provide the means for defraying the expenses of the Post Office Department; and my amendment is strictly within the meaning of the object of the bill as expressed in the title. My amendment is to provide the means for that purpose; and it strikes me it is strictly in order.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment to his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to rule the amendment out of order on the ground that it proposes to change existing laws.

Mr. LETCHER. Does not this other proposition for borrowing money for defraying the expenses of that Department propose to change existing laws? The Post Office Department was organized to be a self-sustaining machine.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment of the gentleman is in conflict with the 81st rule, which provides that no amendment shall be in order to a general appropriation bill, which is not in accordance with existing laws. The propriety of the original provisions in the bill is not a question which is now before the Chair for decision.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This debate is not in order; and I object to it unless the gentleman takes an appeal.

Mr. LETCHER. I do take an appeal if the Chair decides that an amendment for raising revenue to meet the expenses of the Post Office Department is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia changes the existing law; and, therefore, is not in order under the 81st rule.

Mr. LETCHER. From that decision I appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the ground of his decision. He regards this as a bill appropriating the revenue of the Post Office Department as now provided by law. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia proposes to change the law for raising revenue, and is therefore clearly in conflict with the 81st rule.

Mr. LETCHER. The Chair will pardon me. He does not state the fact correctly.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Is the appeal debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not mean to debate it. I only want to correct the statement of the Chair. The Chair stated that this was a bill appropriating the revenues of the Post Office Department. This section does not appropriate the revenues of the Post Office Department, but is to supply revenue from other sources.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Does not the amendment of the gentleman change the law establishing the rates of postage?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, sir; and so does every deficiency bill, which you have passed, change the law.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman permit me to insert another provision in his amendment, abolishing the franking privilege?

Mr. LETCHER. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will simply read the title of the bill, which indicates its character. It is "A bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859." The effect of the amendment is to change the law establishing existing rates of postage, and upon that ground the Chair decides it to be in conflict with the rule, and out of order.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, sir, I withdraw my appeal; and now I will give my views upon the proposition, as there is no means of stopping debate here now.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no amendment offered the bill will be laid aside.

Mr. LETCHER. No, sir; I have the floor upon this bill, and I desire to explain the reasons why I have submitted this proposition. We have heard here, for weeks past, about the War Department and the Navy Department of the Government swallowing up the entire revenue of the country for purposes that are unnecessary. Now, sir, here comes this Post Office Department, about which little or nothing has been said, for which we last year made an appropriation of $2,500,000 to supply a deficiency for the year ending 30th of June, 1858, and during the present session we appropriated $1,469,000 for supplying a still further deficiency for the same year. Then, so far as this present year is concerned, the revenues of the Post Office Department, which was intended as a self-sustaining machine, falls short, by the amount of $3,969,000, of paying its current expenses.

Now, sir, for the next fiscal year the expenses of the Post Office Department are estimated at a little upwards of fifteen million dollars; and in this very section which I propose to amend, is an appropriation of $3,500,000, for the purpose of meeting anticipated deficiencies in the revenues of that Department. I have said that the intention was, in establishing this Department, to make it support itself. This bill proposes to provide other means, derived from other sources, to apply to the service of that Department, to the exclusion of other legitimate objects; and it does seem to me that, if ever there was a proposition coming within the limits prescribed by the rules of the House, which it would be in order to consider in connection with this bill, it is this very proposition.

I have no idea whether this increase of letter-postage rates that I have proposed would make up the amount necessary to cover the entire estimated deficiency for the year ending 30th June, 1859. But I have no doubt it would go a very considerable extent towards accomplishing that result; and instead of having to supply such a sum as is here named, or such a sum as has been supplied during the present year, we may reduce it down to one third or one fourth the sum here asked for.

Now, sir, having given my reasons for the course I have pursued, I am content.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not intend to make a speech, because I do not think it worth while; but, sir, I have in my hands statistics which I would like to send to the Clerk's desk and have read, to go along with the speech of my friend from Virginia. They are the following:

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Chairman, my object in seeking the floor is to address some remarks in reply to what has fallen from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] on the subject of the General Post Office. I protest against the doctrine advanced here, and not for the first time: I mean the doctrine that the Post Office Department ought to be a self-sustaining one. It is, in my judgment, a most unwise policy. It may have been proper in the early period of the Government, when the country was comparatively small, the Treasury empty and burdened with debt, the resources very limited, and the postal routes few. But our condition is entirely changed. The country, in territory and population, has more than doubled; our national resources are unlimited; and the business of the Post Office increased nearly a thousand fold. If we act on that principle, if we carry it out to its legitimate results, we must then stop every mail route where the service on it does not pay the expense. It leads to that result, or it leads just nowhere. I can see no reason why we should pay millions for the Army, millions for the Navy, millions for legislation, and nothing for this branch of the public service which comes more directly home to the people, and from which they derive the more direct and positive advantage. Your mail, carrying the correspondence and the intelligence of the country, is that branch of the Government from which the people derive the largest and most essential benefits. It is that branch of the public service which is felt in its beneficence more than any other; and there is no principle I can perceive why the Government should not contribute to its support, as well as to any other Department.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Is it more incumbent upon the Government to carry letters than it is to carry merchandise?

Mr. MAYNARD. The Government takes the whole business of carrying letters into its charge. It will not allow me to send my letters by any other channel. It will not allow me and my neighbors to establish an express by which we can carry on our communication and correspondence, and we are obliged to use the public post. By the Constitution the subject of "post offices and post roads" is given to the General Government. The framers of that instrument did not think proper to undertake the transportation of merchandise. The reason of the distinction, I presume, is obvious.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The distinct understanding when the Post Office Department was established was, that it should sustain itself; and it was only placed under the charge of the General Government for the convenience of the country.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is that very understanding I am attacking as obsolete, by the changed condition and increased postal necessities of the country. I will submit to the gentleman from Mississippi that if we act on that principle we shall cut off many of the mail routes in his State and my own—not now too numerous for the convenience of the people—and perhaps more than half of the entire mail routes in the country, all that are not in themselves self-sustaining. The principle must go to that extent, or else become a source of gross imposition. For I ask what justice there is to tax the correspondence of this city and the city of Richmond, for example, in order to pay for transporting the mail to some lone hamlet across the Alleghany mountains, where the postal receipts are little more than nominal? What justice is there in it? Yet this is the only alternative. Either this, or else cut off the dwellers in the mountains from all intercourse with the world.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Under the operation of the tariff system, the South more than pays the deficiency in the Post Office Department, when it is known to every man that our mail facilities are totally inadequate.

Mr. MAYNARD. When we come to discuss the tariff, I will meet the gentleman on that subject; but it is not germane to the present discussion. We will, then, inquire who pays the tariff, and whether it operates for our benefit or against us. I am aware that he belongs to one school of political economists, and I belong to another. He honestly entertains one view of the subject, and I just as honestly entertain another, and a very different one.

Mr. BOCOCK. I thought that you were a good Democrat.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am not exactly a Democrat of the school to which my friend from the Piedmont district of Virginia belongs. It is possibly my misfortune.

I have risen, sir, merely for the purpose of expressing my dissent to the views advanced by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] in reference to the idea of making the Post Office Department self-sustaining. This Department is not merely the means of communication and correspondence, but is the great means of our civilization. We are a migratory people. Our brothers, our neighbors, our children, go away, far away, from us; and the means of communicating with them by letters and by newspapers is one of the strongest ties that binds us together as a homogeneous people. It gives to the pioneer settlers, in the very remotest position, many of the best results of culture and social refinement. And I say that we ought to afford full facilities for carrying on that correspondence, without embarrassment or impediment. I do not intend to sanction a doctrine that shall prevent the mail going nearer than twenty or thirty miles to a man's door, simply because it will cost the Government more than the postage which he pays.

Mr. BARKSDALE. When I stated that the mail facilities of the South and West were inadequate, I meant to cast no reflection on the present head of the Post Office Department. He has increased our mail facilities more than any of his predecessors; and under his wise and efficient administration of the Department we have now but little to complain of. I thought it due to the Postmaster General to make this statement.

Mr. MAYNARD. I concur with the gentleman. I unite with him in expressing my approval of the conduct of the present head of the Department in that regard; and I am willing, so far as my vote is concerned, to put my hand into the public Treasury, and strengthen his arm, and to enable him to do more efficiently what he is attempting to do, I believe, in good faith, to the extent of the power intrusted to him. I was unwilling to sit in silence and see his administration embarrassed, by suggestions that he should make the Department self-sustaining; and that, failing to do so, he is guilty of an unwise or unnecessary departure from the less generous policy of some of his predecessors.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the committee rise, with a view to close this debate.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. COLFAX. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. GARNETT. I am opposed to this railroad speed in manufacturing appropriation bills. I move that the committee rise, in order that we may adjourn. We have been here long enough.

The question was taken on Mr. GARNETT's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SICKLES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly a bill (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, which he was directed to report back to the House with sundry amendments; also, a bill (H. R. No. 466) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, which he was also directed to report to the House; and also a bill (H. R. No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, upon which the committee had come to no conclusion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I demand the previous question upon both the bills reported to the House.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to offer to the Navy appropriation bill the amendment which I offered in committee. I want to have a vote upon it in the House. I withdrew it in committee because I did not want to break up the committee for want of a quorum; and I believe it was the understanding that I should have an opportunity to offer it in the House.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will consent to that before the previous question is ordered.

Mr. SEWARD then offered the amendment which he had previously offered in committee, in relation to Blythe Island.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put, upon the bill making appropriations for the naval service.

Mr. HOUSTON. I stated yesterday to the House that I would object to any amendment making an appropriation being offered in the House which had not been considered first in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman should have made his objection before the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Chair proceeded so rapidly that it was impossible.

COLLECTING THE REVENUES.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put, upon the bill making appropriation to defray the expense of collecting the revenues from customs.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I desire to consult the wishes of the House in reference to these bills. If it is the pleasure of the House to go on and act upon the amendments to-night, I am ready to go on. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. GARNETT. I rise to a point of order. The main question having been ordered, no other business than that is in order, except an adjournment.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. GARNETT moved (at half past seven o'clock) that the House adjourn.

Mr. GROW. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of general debate only.

Mr. GARNETT. I have no objection to that, and withdraw my motion to adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is not in order if objection be made, as the previous question has been seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. ENGLISH. Would it be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the main question to be put?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. ENGLISH. Then I make that motion.

Mr. GARNETT. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. ADRAIN. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. What will be the condition of those bills, if we now adjourn?

The SPEAKER. They will come up the first thing in the morning.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Would it not be in order for the House to go on and pass those bills to-night?

Several MEMBERS. There is not a quorum present.

The motion was agreed to.

And thereupon, the House (at seven o'clock and thirty-five minutes, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 27, 1859.

Prayer by Rev. J. R. NICHOLS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 201) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, amended and disagreed to by the House of Representatives, reported thereon; and, on his motion, the Senate insisted on its amendments, and agreed to ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. PEARCE, Mr. FITZPATRICK, and Mr. TRUMBULL were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The VICEPRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, communicating the annual report of its operations, expenditures, and condition; which, on motion of Mr. PEARCE, was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PEARCE submitted the following order; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Ordered, That ten thousand extra copies of the report of the regents of the Smithsonian Institution be printed, twenty-five hundred of which for the use of the Institution.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. IVERSON presented the memorial of Elizabeth Spear, widow of Thomas Williams, who was killed in battle, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. POLK presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms or lots for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RICE presented a memorial of the city of St. Paul, Minnesota, praying permission to enter a small strip of Government land, lying within the corporate limits of that city; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GREEN presented a petition of citizens of Nebraska, in that portion of the Territory lying upon the Missouri river, and between the mouths of the Big Sioux and the Running Water rivers, praying that that tract of country may be attached to and form a part of the Territory of Dacotah; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. TOOMBS presented a resolution of the Legislature of Georgia, in favor of the enactment of a law to relinquish the Indian title to certain reservations in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the memorial of E. B. Bishop, and a memorial of the board of marine surveyors of Philadelphia, reported adversely thereon, and that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorials; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of William A. Vaughan, John Smith, W. D. Little, and Nathaniel Dennett, jr., submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 329) to authorize augmented rates for surveying the public lands, reported it with an amendment. He also submitted a letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with accompanying papers relating to the bill; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Ebenezer Ricker, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 411) for the relief of Ebenezer Ricker. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the papers relating to the claim of Elbridge Lawton, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution to pay the Hon. Willis A. Gorman for his services as commissioner to investigate certain alleged frauds of the superintendent of Indian affairs for the northern superintendency, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the report of the Court of Claims in the case of Jacob Bigelow, administrator of Francis Cazeau, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Iowa, relative to granting a license to Lewis A. Thomas for a ferry, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of Giles S. Isham, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the petition of Walter Nexsen, and the memorial of Henry S. Crabbe, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 322) for the relief of purchasers of public lands within the timbered reserve opposite Fort Kearny and for the settlers within the Winnebago agency reservation, the Fort Atkinson reservation, and the timber reserve opposite Fort Crawford, all in the State of Iowa, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RICE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 412) supplemental to "An act for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONDITION OF THE NAVY.

Mr. COLLAMER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the Senate of the time at which each of the vessels of the Navy was built, and the original cost thereof, and the amount and time of the repairs on each, exceeding $5,000 at one time; also, the present condition of each as to competency for service, and where the same now are.

WARD'S FIRE-ARMS.

Mr. IVERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting an amendment, providing an appropriation to the Army bill, to authorize the Secretary of War to adopt, and apply on a limited scale to the present or future arms of the United States, the late improvement in fire-arms of Captain J. N. Ward.

POTOMAC RIVER.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate any information in his possession showing the necessity of an improvement in the Potomac river, in the District of Columbia, what the obstructions in the river now cost the Government annually, and his opinion upon the necessity or expediency of said improvement.

POST OFFICE REGULATIONS.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to inform the Senate whether the book, published by John C. Rives, in 1857, entitled "List of Post Offices in the United States, with the names of Postmasters, on the 13th of July, 1857; also, the regulations and laws of the Post Office Department, compiled from the records of the Post Office Department, by D. D. T. Leech," is recognized by the Department as containing correct copies of its regulations in force at the time of its publication; and whether said book is furnished to deputy postmasters and post office agents, for their government in the discharge of their official duties; also the same information in regard to a book published by George S. Gidcom, in 1835, compiled by the said D. D. T. Leech, and entitled "List of Post Offices," &c.; and especially whether regulations in that book, Nos. 52, 53, 75, 110, and 117, respectively, were in force in July, August, and September, 1857; and whether said last-mentioned book, or a second edition thereof, published by Shillington, was furnished in 1855 and 1856 to postmasters and special agents of the Post Office Department, as a guide for their official conduct; and whether the regulations in said last-mentioned book abolished or repealed all former regulations of the Department, inconsistent with their provisions.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The VICEPRESIDENT signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Nancy Serena; which had heretofore received the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed an enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 32) making appropriations to pay the expenses of the several investigating committees of the House of Representatives; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

ALEXANDER J. ATOTCHA.

Mr. MASON. I ask the Senate to take up a resolution which was offered some days since by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] requiring the Court of Claims to return to the Senate the papers in the case of Alexander J. Atotcha. The case was referred to the Court of Claims; and I am informed that the court have decided that they have no jurisdiction.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand that the Court of Claims disclaim jurisdiction. If so, I make no objection to an order for the return of the papers.

Mr. MASON. I am so informed, I have not inquired at the Court of Claims; but I suppose such is the fact.

The motion to take up the resolution was agreed to; and it was adopted, as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the Court of Claims to return to the Senate the bill and papers relating to the claim of Alexander J. Atotcha.

LAND LAWS ON THE PACIFIC.

Mr. STUART. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 179) for extending the land laws east of the Cascade Mountains, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it back, without amendment, and recommend its passage. This is a bill of only seven lines, and I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to pass it at this time, because it is important that the necessary arrangements should be made to commence the surveys at once.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It extends the existing laws relating to the survey and disposal of the public lands in the Territories of Oregon and Washington, west of the Cascade Mountains, and makes them applicable to the lands lying east of those mountains within those Territories.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF PURSERS' CLERKS.

Mr. HALE. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 336) for the relief of B. W. Palmer and others, have instructed me to report the same back with an amendment, and to ask for the consideration of the bill at the present time. I will state what the object of it is, if the Senate will give me their ear. By the present law of 1835, clerks or assistants to pursers receive a salary of $500 a year, with the exception of the purser's assistant in the navy-yard at Kittery, Maine. He, by law, gets $750. The Department thinks that $750 is not too much, and they have accordingly estimated for that ever since 1854, and it has been actually paid. The Auditor has determined, and I think very properly, that that payment is illegal; that an estimate and an appropriation will not warrant payment without an absolute provision of law, and therefore recommends that a law be made to conform to what the practice has been for three years. The accounts are suspended, and he says he will not settle them until they have an opportunity to come to Congress. The same thing is the case in regard to the clerks at the navy-yards at Kittery and Philadelphia. The same appropriations have been made, the same payments have been made, but the Auditor says illegally, and the Department ask now that we may pass a law to do what they have been doing without law for three years. That is the whole of it. It has the unanimous sanction of the committee and the Navy Department, and the accounts are suspended until the bill is passed.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 336) for the relief of B. W. Palmer and others.

It proposed to confirm the excess of salary paid to B. W. Palmer and others, as pursers' clerks at certain navy-yards, under the estimates made in the naval appropriation bills since the year 1853, with a proviso that this was not to be construed into a repeal of the existing laws regulating the pay of pursers' clerks; and that their salary was not hereafter to exceed $600 per annum.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported the bill with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to allow all payments made since the 1st day of July, 1854, to the clerks or assistants at pursers at the navy-yards at Charlestown, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Norfolk, and Pensacola, at the rate of $750 per annum; and to allow all payments made since the said 1st day of July, to first clerks to commandants, and to clerks of the yards at Kittery and Philadelphia, at the rate of $1,200 per annum; and that the pay of said clerks shall hereafter be $1,200 per annum, and of pursers' clerks or assistants shall be $750 per annum, commencing with the current fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE. The title should be amended so as to read: "An act relating to the compensation of pursers' assistants and clerks."

It was so amended.

PAY OF REVENUE OFFICERS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senate to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 482) regulating the compensation of officers and marines of revenue cutters. I think it will not occupy five minutes.

Mr. HUNTER. I object to taking up that bill. It is a bill to raise the salaries of officers of the revenue cutters. Does the Senator expect to pass that through without debate?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir. The House has already passed the bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not think it will pass here without debate.

Mr. HAMLIN. The same bill has passed the Senate half a dozen times in as many different sessions, but has never before been reached in the House of Representatives. The Senate, year after year, have passed this identical bill, and I have no doubt that when you come to a vote there will not be half a dozen Senators in this body who will vote against it. The increase is very slight. The present pay of these officers is very small. The bill received the unanimous approbation of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 482) regulating the compensation of the officers and marines of the revenue cutters.

It directs that the compensation of the officers of the revenue cutters shall be at the following rates, to wit: captains, $1,500 per annum; first lieutenants, $1,200 per annum; second lieutenants, $1,100 per annum; third lieutenants, $1,000 per annum; engineers, $1,200 per annum; assistant engineers, $1,000 per annum. The wages of the petty officers, gunners, and marines, are to be regulated and fixed by the President of the United States so as not to exceed forty dollars per month, exclusive of rations.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to know what the present compensation of these officers is, and how much it is proposed to increase it? I should be glad if the gentleman would inform me.

Mr. HAMLIN. One thousand two hundred dollars is the present pay for captains; we propose to make it $1,500. Nine hundred and sixty dollars is now the pay for first lieutenants, and $1,200 is proposed. Eight hundred dollars, I think, is the pay for a second lieutenant, and it is proposed to be made $1,100. It is a very slight increase.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not believe this is the time for increasing the salaries of these officers. We all know that the expense of collecting the revenue has increased very largely within the last few years. We know that it already amounts to a sum which is a very serious charge. I believe there is a bill now pending in the House of Representatives providing for the annual expense, at a rate something like four million dollars; and I think it a very unpropitious time to be increasing the salaries or emoluments of the officers of this Government. I understand there are a great many applicants for these places, at the present salary; a great many more than can be supplied. Under these circumstances, I am opposed to the passage of any bill to increase their pay. It is not so small an increase as the Senator would have us suppose. It is something like twenty or twenty-five per cent. on the old salaries. I am utterly opposed, at this time, to increasing salaries.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will not debate the matter. I simply want to repeat that this increase has been recommended year after year by your Treasury Department.

Mr. HUNTER. Does the present Secretary of the Treasury recommend it?

Mr. HAMLIN. I think so.

Mr. HUNTER. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will not say for certain, because I do not know; but I will say, that for the last half a dozen years every Secretary has recommended it, and every Committee on Commerce on the part of the Senate has approved of it, and reported on it favorably. The House of Representatives this year has passed the bill, and the Senate Committee on Commerce have unanimously reported it back.

Mr. BIGLER. I hope this bill will pass. The compensation of these officers is totally insufficient. I can see no reason why the officers in this service should be confined to a compensation entirely inadequate, bearing no relation to similar service in the Army or Navy.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to have the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TOOMBS. Let the bill be read again.

The Secretary read it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time. On the question, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. HUNTER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Bigler, Bright, Clay, Collier, Dixon, Fessenden, Green, Gwin, Hamlin, Hammond, Iverson, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Seward, Stuart, Thompson of New Jersey, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clingman, Davis, Fitch, Foster, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Pearce, Polk, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Simmons, Sibley, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, and Wright—23.

So the bill was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (No. 456) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs; and

A bill (No. 499) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

N. C. TOWLE.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 343) making appropriations for repairing the piers at the harbor of Sheboygan, Wisconsin.

Mr. IVERSON. I ask the Senator to waive that motion for the present, and allow me to take up the resolution paying the little account of Mr. Towle that we had up yesterday morning. I do not wish to debate it; I merely want it decided whether the Senate will pass the resolution or not. He has not received any money. It is two years since he performed the service, and he wants the question decided.

Mr. SEWARD. If the honorable Senator will not press it if it causes debate, I shall waive my motion for the present.

Mr. IVERSON. Very well; I will not debate it myself, and I trust it will be decided at once.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the sum of $321 be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to N. C. Towle, for mileage and expenses in visiting the Aroostook country, in Maine, under a resolution of the Senate of August 13, 1855.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. It seems to me that the resolution ought to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The committee having charge of the contingent fund, I understand, is a mere auditing committee; and this account has been made out and presented to that committee, and it has been audited and an allowance made.

The allowance made by that auditing committee, Mr. Towle refuses to accept. He wishes to override the committee who have audited the account and made a liberal allowance, and comes before the Senate with a resolution to get an allowance over what the auditing committee has proposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a motion to commit?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I think it ought to be referred. I move that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. WADE. I really hope this little matter will not take up much more time. I suppose I ought to say something about it, because I was the principal mover of the original resolution that resulted in the employment of this man to do this service. It originated in the Committee on Claims when I was a member of that committee. If gentlemen knew the nature of the service Mr. Towle performed, I believe they would withdraw all objection, for I think it would be manifest to every one that he has been more moderate in his charges than any Government officer ever was before.

He was clerk to the Committee on Claims. A question arose before that committee in regard to a great variety of small land titles that the Government were bound to pay for on account of the running of the northeastern boundary line, under the Ashburton treaty. The Senate has consented to the justice of these claims. I believe there were some sixty or seventy small landholders who had lost their titles by that treaty, who petitioned to be remunerated for the land they had thus lost. That was referred to the Committee on Claims while I was a member of the committee, and it was found almost impossible to settle the amount due to each claimant. That something was due was perfectly apparent; but the amount and value of the land of each one depended on independent evidence of its own. The committee were unwilling to act for several years, not knowing what to do, because they had no evidence that was satisfactory of the amount of these men's claims, although each of them was only for a small sum. It was suggested in the committee that it would be necessary to send some commissioner there, to go upon the ground and take testimony that would satisfy the committee precisely what was due to each, and I introduced the resolution myself in the Senate. In order to do it without embarrassing the House of Representatives with the matter, we made it a Senate resolution. We supposed it would take too long, and would delay the matter indefinitely, to pass such a resolution through both branches. We passed a Senate resolution to the effect that the Committee on Claims might employ a commissioner for the purpose of ascertaining these facts, and reporting them to the Senate.

When that resolution was passed, the question arose who should be sent. I knew that our clerk was the most competent man for the service of whom I had any knowledge; we all knew that. He was a man who was fully acquainted with all that the committee wished to ascertain; he had heard the subject discussed, and it occurred to us that he would be the most proper man to send, inasmuch as he was an excellent business man, and knew exactly the state of the controversy, and what we wished to ascertain by evidence. We urged him to go. He did not want to go there. Some gentleman here has suggested that he went on an excursion of pleasure. It was no such thing. In justice to this clerk, I ought to say that he solicited no such position at all, but it was because the committee believed him the most competent man to do this business in the cheapest and shortest way, that we urged it upon him, and told him there was no doubt that the Senate would be willing to compensate him fairly. Now, what has he charged? He has not charged a single cent for the time he was there. All he has asked of the Senate is barely to remunerate him for his outlay in doing the business, and he did it quicker and better than any other man would have done it, and to the entire satisfaction of the Senate, who have assumed what he did to be right, and passed a bill accordingly. We ought not to stand here higgling about the amount of this little charge.

Mr. SEWARD. What is the sum?

Mr. WADE. Something over three hundred dollars, and I hope the Senate will pay it.

Mr. SEWARD. Let us have the question.
Mr. WADE. I will say, that there is no committee of the Senate so competent to judge of the matter as the Committee on Claims. They know all about it, and I think they being satisfied, the Senate ought to be satisfied.

Mr. IVERSON. I hope the motion to refer this resolution to the Committee on Contingent Expenses will not prevail. It has already been referred to that committee, and they have decided to allow $200. It comes up now as an appeal from the Committee on Contingent Expenses to the Senate to decide. If it goes to that committee they will decide the same way as before; they will audit the account for $200, and the question will come up on appeal to the Senate, and we shall have the same question over again. We shall gain nothing by referring it. If the chairman of that committee thinks $200 is sufficient and that $321 ought not to be allowed, let him move an amendment of that sort. If the amendment prevails, that will be an end of the question; if not, let us pass the original resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The state of the case is this: in the first instance this gentleman was a clerk to the Committee on Claims. They were authorized by resolution to send him North to obtain some testimony. After he returned from the trip, his account was made out; it was indorsed by the Committee on Claims, and application was made to the Secretary for payment. It is made the duty of the Secretary, under the 34th rule, to submit all such claims to the Committee on Contingent Expenses; and they took up the claim; they examined it, and they allowed $200, which has been standing there in a condition to be drawn by this clerk at any time he saw proper. It is not necessary to have the action of the Senate at all for him to get the $200. This clerk was in the employment of the Committee on Claims; and he was getting six dollars per day. They were authorized to send North to obtain this information in reference to some land; and they sent him. He went North; and he made out his account for two thousand miles travel, $200. In addition to that, for thirty-three days while he was gone, he put down additional expenses at three dollars a day; and, besides that, twenty-two dollars for hiring a buggy. The committee thought that, while drawing $1,800 a year from the Government, his additional expenses were all that they ought to pay; and ten cents a mile would cover all actual charges. They were willing to pay that amount, though he was in the receipt of $1,800 per annum. They allow him $200 in addition to pay the expenses of going North and coming back.

Mr. IVERSON. If the Senator from Tennessee will withdraw his motion to recommit, we can then have the vote on the proposition; and if the Senate think $200 sufficient, they can vote down the resolution, and the audit for $200 stands, and he can get it; it would be wholly useless to send the question to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I hope the question will be taken on the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I will withdraw my motion with a single observation. Your Committee on Contingent Expenses have examined this account; the indorsement of the respected deceased chairman of that committee (Mr. Evans) is on the papers; and the man can, on that indorsement, draw the $200 at any time he thinks proper. The best motion would be to lay this resolution on the table; for he could then get his $200, if he thinks proper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to refer having been withdrawn, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Nobody had more respect for the Senator from South Carolina who was the former chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, than myself; but I suppose he was liable to error like other men; and in this particular, I have no doubt, he committed an error. The Senator from Tennessee does not understand this matter; he certainly does not understand it as well as the Committee on Claims, who originated the whole proceeding. It is a trifling matter; but it is of some consequence that we should do justice, at any rate.

He goes upon the assumption that, when this order was passed by the Senate, it was to authorize the Committee on Claims to send their clerk, who received so much annual pay. That was not the order. It authorized the Committee on Claims to send some person to take this testimony; but if they had employed another person, not their clerk, a man who was not in the employment of the Government, we should not have got off for anything like the sum which has been charged by the clerk for this service. Nobody would have gone there, been six weeks absent, traveled two thousand miles, gone into a new country, slept in huts, and got along as he could from place to place in the woods, with a view to take this testimony, for three or four weeks doing exceeding hard work, for merely his expenses.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I would ask, was he not receiving his six dollars a day?

Mr. FESSENDEN. What of that? I am answering that very argument. Suppose he was receiving his six dollars a day. The resolution authorized the Committee on Claims to send an agent. He was here, and if he had staid here, he would have had his leisure in the recess, like other clerks of committees. He would have had some time to enjoy himself in such a way as he pleased. The business of the committee is not so great as to occupy all a man's time; but this was no part of his duty. The committee could not order him to go. It is no part of the duties of a clerk to a committee to go and travel, and take testimony, and settle a case in that way. They requested him, and urged him, to give up time which he might have devoted to his own purposes, for the benefit of the Committee on Claims and the Senate; instead of appointing a new agent, who would necessarily have charged, and been entitled to charge us, a larger sum. They prevailed on their clerk, whose business it was not, who was under no obligation to do it, to forgo his own pleasure, and devote six weeks of the hottest part of the summer, traveling that distance; sleeping in huts, going around from place to place, to take this testimony. After he has done all that, the gentleman says he has been receiving his six dollars a day. He would have received his six dollars a day, if he had staid here and done nothing. He comes here and submits a very small bill; made small on purpose, because he was the clerk of the committee; not charging as an agent properly appointed, taken from any other place, would have been entitled to charge; but because he was clerk of the committee, and was prevailed upon to do this service by the unanimous wish of the Committee on Claims, you want to strike him down to his mere expenses for traveling. It is ungenerous, and the honorable chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, did not understand the merits of the case; nor do any of these gentlemen understand it; nor can they so well understand it as the Committee on Claims, who appointed him. When he exhibited his account to us, we were all surprised at the very small amount he charged, and we all cheerfully and willingly, signed our names to the certificate that he deserved, and ought to receive, the amount there charged, only about three hundred and twenty dollars, for his six weeks' work, all that labor, and all that travel, and rendering most essential service to the country, and unquestionably saving a good deal of money to the Government, if the bill shall finally pass.

Now, it is wrong, it is unjust, to say that, because he happened to be clerk of our committee, therefore, when he undertakes this business, which was no part of his regular labor, at our request and the request of the Senate, and has incurred these expenses, you will avail yourselves of the fact that he was clerk to the Committee on Claims, to say that he shall have nothing but his actual expenses of traveling. It is applying a rule to him that we should not be justified, in my judgment, in applying to any man. I feel no interest in this, except that I think to reject this resolution would be a gross injustice; and it would be dealing hardly, also, with the Committee on Claims, who employed him, and who unanimously recommended that he should be paid, knowing the value of the services better than anybody else than himself could know it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to amend the resolution by striking out, in the first line, the present amount, $321, and inserting "$230."

Mr. POLK. I wish merely to state, in explanation of the vote I shall give in this case, that, as I understand the Committee on Claims, or those who constituted the committee at the time these services were rendered, have unanimously recommended the payment of this bill, in the language of the Senator from Maine, I shall vote for the resolution. At the same time, I must say that I do it in deference to the opinion of that committee, who had the services performed, and who know what the services were. My judgment, aside from that, or the facts of the case, would be that the amount allowed by the Auditing Committee of the Contingent Expenses of the Senate would be sufficient. I am a member of the Committee on Claims myself, and I shall defer to the judgment of my predecessors, inasmuch as I think they were better able to judge of what was fair than I can be.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. There is a principle involved in this matter. As the agent of the committee going North, the clerk makes out his account for two thousand miles' travel, and charges ten cents a mile. He charges, in addition to that, for thirty-three days, three dollars per day additional expenses. He further charges twenty-two dollars for buggy hire. For these thirty-three days that he charges three dollars each he was in the employ of this committee, drawing regularly his six dollars per day. Ten cents a mile, we know, will more than cover all the expenses he incurred. He was drawing his salary regularly. If we make this allowance of additional compensation, what becomes of the principle of the law that prohibits additional compensation, or, in other words, officers from drawing two salaries at the same time? Eighteen hundred dollars a year is pretty good pay. He was drawing six dollars a day, and we are willing to allow him ten cents a mile to cover all the expenses; and still we are talking about liberality. We know that these gentlemen, who are clerks of committees, are scarcely employed one half of the year. Here is the indorsement made on the papers by the venerated and respected chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, recently deceased: "$200 is the amount that should be paid." The money is ready for him at any time. Instead of taking that, that committee, after auditing the accounts, are to be over-slaughed, and $320 is to be voted to meet his peculiar notion of dignity and expense. We allow him $200, and give him his six dollars per day. Is not that enough? If he could do better at anything else, I have no doubt he would do it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You might just as well overslaugh the Committee on Contingent Expenses as the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WADE. I do not like to say anything more about this case. It is not within my jurisdiction; but still I feel in honor bound to stand by the man whom I recommended for this service, when injustice is about to be done him; not knowingly, I presume. Now, sir, we are great in small things. I wish we could reverse this. When diplomatic gentlemen employed by the year, at a great salary abroad, are requested by the Government to go to a neighboring court, there is no Senator here that makes wry faces at paying an outfit and salary over again, and paying a large amount of money. But when a mere clerk is engaged, and sent on special service not at all connected with his general duties, that is a mighty thing, and every man stares at it as though the country were going to be ruined by paying him for such service.

I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that in all instances, so far as I know, whether the practice be right or wrong, wherever any officer is engaged by the year, on a certain business, at a salary, if the Government employ him on special service, not pertaining to his ordinary duties, they have paid him for that special service. There is not a committee in this body but has reported bills on that principle. Why should we undertake to reverse it here? Indeed, the rule which the Senator would apply is not applicable here. What was it? The resolution had no relation to this officer at all, but it empowered the Committee on Claims to employ an agent for this purpose. If we had employed a perfect stranger, we should have heard no objection to paying him; you would have paid him twice this amount, and then said he would not have had enough; but because it occurred to us that this gentleman was better qualified than anybody else, we sent him. He would have received just as much if he had staid at home, in point of salary. He did the service quicker and better, and more to the satisfaction of the committee and the Senate, than anybody else could have done, and yet we are higgling about the small amount of pay! I will not detain the Senate on it. Let us have the vote.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think this matter had better lie over. It is evident this discussion is to go on. ["Question! question!"] Gentlemen will not stop talking.

Several Senators. Let us vote.

The amendment of Mr. Wright was rejected. The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. As gentlemen talk so much about expenses, let us make a record as we go on. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 31, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Drake, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Green, Hale, Hamlin, Hammond, Harlan, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Thompson of Kentucky, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bigler, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Hunter, Johnson of Tennessee, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, Toombs, and Wright—12.

So the resolution was passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance:

A bill (No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th June, 1859; and

A bill (No. 466) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

WIDOW OF GENERAL SMITH.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the Senate now to take up the bill for repairing the piers in the harbor of Sheboygan, Wisconsin.

Mr. SLIDELL. Will the Senator from New York give way to permit me to introduce a bill for the relief of General Smith's widow, with a view to reference?

Mr. SEWARD. With great pleasure.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 413) for the relief of Mrs. Ann Smith, widow of the late Brevet Brigadier General Persifer F. Smith; and it was read twice by its title.

Mr. SLIDELL. I would ask the immediate consideration of the Senate to this bill, believing that it will lead to no discussion, and that the feeling of the Senate will be unanimous in concurrence with the proposition I have made; but, as I am indebted to the courtesy of the Senator from New York for the favor on this occasion, I will not press it unless he shall be willing that it be now considered.

Mr. SEWARD. To-morrow morning I will cooperate with the Senator on it with great pleasure.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will state to the Senator from New York, that there is great appropriateness in passing the bill to-day, as this is the day of the funeral ceremonies of General Smith. I can say here, of my own knowledge, that he leaves his widow in very destitute circumstances. It is quite unnecessary for me to enter into any details of the merits of General Smith. His military career is part of the history of the country, familiar to us all; and if the bill is to be passed at all, I think it may be done with peculiar grace to-day. I do not think it will lead to any protracted discussion.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am opposed to it.

Mr. SEWARD. I understand there is objection.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am opposed to it. I want these cases put upon principle. I am not for making exceptional cases to a general law without any reason except that the applicant died in the public service.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will state to the Senator from Georgia, that this bill is a textual copy of the bill for the relief of Mrs. Worth, which passed the Senate almost unanimously two years ago.

Mr. TOOMBS. It passed wrong.

Mr. SLIDELL. Then I think it better to move its reference to the Committee on Pensions, if I can be assured that there will be a report from that committee to-morrow.

Mr. KING. The committee do not meet until Monday.

Mr. SLIDELL. Then let it lie over until to-morrow, when I shall call it up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will lie over.

Mr. SLIDELL subsequently said: I understand that the Senator from Georgia either did not explain his views properly, or that the Chair misunderstood him. He did not wish to object to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Mrs. Smith, and is willing that it should now be considered.

Mr. TOOMBS. I merely stated that I should oppose the bill, and then the Senator from New York said there was objection. I am very strongly opposed to the principle of a bill granting this benefit, and shall vote against it, and probably give my views against it, but I have no objection to its being considered.

Mr. SLIDELL. I move to postpone the special order for the purpose of considering the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator from Georgia withdraws his objection, I shall interpose the same objection to its consideration before it goes to a committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the bill cannot be considered to-day.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 343) for repairing the piers at the harbor of Sheboygan, Wisconsin.

Mr. PUGH offered an amendment to include all the other improvement bills reported by the Committee on Commerce; upon which

Mr. HUNTER and Mr. TOOMBS spoke until one o'clock. [These speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. CLAY. The hour for the consideration of the special order has arrived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. IVERSON in the chair.) The Chair will call up the special order, which is the bill (S. No. 25) to grant to every person who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I believe the pending question on the homestead bill is upon an amendment of my own. Now, sir, from the intimations made by Senators around the Chamber, I have thought it very probable that a majority of the Senate are disinclined to pass that bill. The Senate and House of Representatives have agreed to adjourn on Monday week, and there is a great pressure of business. Then, while it is proper, if the majority desire to pass the bill, that we should go on and perfect it; on the other hand, if the Senate are disinclined at this time to pass the measure, we had better, if we can, get a test vote on that point at least. It being in order to move to postpone it, I move to postpone it until next January. I would prefer myself an indefinite postponement; but that would place it where, if the Senate, at the next session, were disposed to act on it, they could not do so. I hope that the Senator from Tennessee will allow us to decide this point. I am perfectly willing, if the majority are favorable to the bill at this time, that discussion and action may go on; but, on the other hand, if the Senate are disinclined to that, I hope it will be postponed. I make the motion to postpone it until the first Monday of January, hoping that it may not give rise to debate.

Mr. SEWARD. I have no objection to the motion to postpone to the 1st of January being made now, if the opponents of the homestead bill think it is important to do so, and to make that a test question. I, at the same time, think it unnecessary to make the motion at this time, because I have risen for the purpose of moving to postpone the consideration of the special order, the homestead bill, until to-morrow, for the purpose of enabling the Senate to go through with the river and harbor bills. However, the other motion is made, and I shall not object to it. I wish to give notice, however, that I shall, on the first opportunity I have, ask leave to introduce a resolution extending this session of Congress until the 21st day of June.

Mr. HUNTER. I submit a motion to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the appropriation bill.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Let us try my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. KING. Let us take the vote and ascertain the sense of the Senate on the homestead bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to have the yeas and nays on the motion to postpone.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to me we ought to have a fuller Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The motion to postpone to a day certain is debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I do not intend to debate the question; but it does seem to me that if the Senate of the United States will ever be prepared to act definitely on this measure, it must be at the present time. It is not my intention to repeat anything that I have said on any former occasion; but this measure has been under consideration since 1846 up to the present time; it has been settled again and again in the public mind. It passed the House of Representatives by a majority of two thirds on two several occasions—in 1852 and 1854. As it has now been before the Senate during the whole session, made a special order at an early day, and has been discussed day after day, public opinion coming here in various shapes demanding action on this measure, it does seem to me that the time has come when the Senate ought to act upon it.

This measure has been lost in this body twice. The popular branch of Congress has passed it on two occasions by overwhelming majorities. Why delay it? Why postpone action on this subject? If the public will is to be met and to be carried out by the passage of the bill, let it be done. If the public will is to be disappointed and disregarded, let it be done. I am in hopes the Senate will let us act on the subject directly, instead of postponing it. The bill is now nearly matured, and I presume action can be had in a very short time. Let us vote directly on it, and let the country understand what we intend to do after having had it under consideration so long. I would almost venture—yet I will not dare to do it—to make a single appeal, in behalf of the homeless thousands in the United States, to the Senate to take up and pass this measure, and grant what they have long demanded; grant what they have appealed to you for again and again. Now, the time has come. Some gentlemen seem to be a little timid, and do not like to take ground on so important a measure, because they do not know where it will go and to what extent it will affect the public mind. Why delay? Why cannot the voice of the people be heard? Why cannot the feelings and wishes and wants of the country be subserved? Let us act definitely; either reject the proposition or pass it into a law. I do hope—I ask it in behalf of the homeless, the landless thousands in the United States—that the Senate will act definitely on this measure.

Mr. FOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to postpone the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I do not desire to discuss this proposition, especially at this time. I am not in health to say what I should like to say on this measure. I think the honorable Senator from Tennessee, in saying that the public demands this bill, and that its propriety is a foregone conclusion in the public conviction, is altogether in error, so far as my knowledge goes. I could briefly show the history of the measure. It has once or twice passed the other House as a sort of measure that would tell all over the country. I do not mean to say that it was a demagogical measure or anything of that sort, but it was inconsiderately voted upon. It was once considered here in the Senate and killed outright. It is a pretty large expenditure of what, at least, is one of the sources of public revenue; and while I give to the Senator from Tennessee all credit for his bill and for his feelings for the homeless and houseless, still this is a time when we have to provide for the wants of the Government. I do not think the public granary is full enough to be giving out wine and oil, as they may be called for at any time.

But, as I said, I am not in health to express what I want to say on this bill. I hope it will be laid over until January, when we can take it up and vote on it fairly, and then if it prevails, let it prevail. Let us husband our resources. Festina lente—let us get along slower. We are getting along at a very rapid rate, giving away, and lending, and borrowing money. I decline, so far as debate is concerned, to say anything at all on the measure now. I hope it will go over until next year, when we may look at it maturely, and if it is to be passed, and must be passed, I want to get it in the best shape it ought to be in. I think it needs a great many amendments; at least similar bills, that have heretofore come under my supervision did. I have not had a chance to examine this bill as I should like. I hope the motion to postpone will prevail; not that I would not like to accommodate the Senator from Tennessee; not that I desire to delay the bill; but if it be passed, it ought to be licked into the best possible shape, for it is an ugly affair at any rate. I think we ought to have a little time on it. A little sleep, before this immense domain goes, would be well enough, and considerate enough, especially as it is suggested that we are on the eve of an adjournment. I do not want to provoke any discussion on the merits of the question now. I hope the motion to postpone it, at least for the time being, will prevail.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. One single remark in reply to the Senator from Kentucky, in reference to the evidences of public opinion. All that I rely upon, in connection with other demonstrations, is that this measure has been twice before the House of Representatives. The members of that body, representing every congressional district in the United States, have passed the bill by overwhelming majorities twice—in 1852, and 1854. This seems to me some evidence of public opinion. In addition to that, we have resolutions of various State Legislatures throughout the Confederacy. In addition to that, we have public demonstrations and public meetings, societies, and various organizations throughout the whole country, all coming here with a single voice. Where is the great demonstration that has ever been made against it? Where is the public opinion that has been pronounced against it? I do not know. It seems to me that the public judgment has been rendered, again and again, in favor of this important measure. It is now the public judgment of the country.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator from Tennessee allow me to suggest to him that the only difficulty he will experience, or that we shall experience, in the passage of the homestead bill—for I am with him on that subject—will be the want of time to pass it this session, and that every word of debate we indulge in in regard to postponements abridges so much of the time we have to pass it in? Let us have the question today; and if he will go with me to-morrow, or the first time I can get an opportunity to submit the proposition, and extend the session, he may secure the passage of the bill in that way.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. If necessary, I will vote to extend the session, to enable us to pass this bill.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, I shall make that motion the first time I get an opportunity. Now let us have the question.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. In reply to the Senator from Tennessee, I will say that the votes passed by the House of Representatives are not conclusive evidence of what the judgment and sense of the country is; and what State Legislatures or societies may have done is still less evidence, for they do almost anything that is brought before them and advocated vehemently and ardently. If you talk to them about homeless and houseless people, and all that sort of thing, they will vote whatever is asked, and memorialize Congress in reference to a thousand things they know nothing about. I do not want to embarrass or delay this measure. If it is to be passed, let it be done; but then I want it to be fairly done; and I should like to have a chance, really, to say something about the bill. I have a good deal to say about it. I hope it will be laid over until next session. I assure the gentleman I shall interpose no objection or obstacle next session, if you can pass it in the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. One single remark. The Senator, from 1846 up to the present time, has had this subject under consideration, a period of over twelve years. If he has not had an opportunity to examine and bring his mind to a conclusion after considering a subject for twelve years, I ask the friends of this measure what assurance they have of getting his support, if it shall be postponed?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I am not acquainted with the particulars of the bill now before us. I have not examined it. The general subject I have had before my mind.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. It is in substance the same provision, and if the Senator cannot bring his mind to a conclusion in twelve years, when will he be enabled to come to a conclusion?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. My mind is made up conclusively, in regard to that; I am against it, but I want to put it in as good a shape as I can. The Senator from Tennessee certainly misunderstands me. I say if it is to become the law of the country, make it as judiciously and wisely as you can, put it in good shape, with all proper provisions. I will not offer a solitary amendment myself. I will not try to kill it indirectly. I will not try to maim it—just take it squarely and fairly, let its friends perfect it—but I am not willing to progress with it just now. My mind has been made up, and very conclusively, though on this special bill I have not bestowed any particular attention. My purpose is not to defeat the measure ultimately if it has strength enough to carry it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. It is very apparent that the Senator is against it under any circumstances. It would make no difference to him what shape this bill might assume, ultimately or at present, he is against it. His object is to defeat it. If he intends to defeat it, and is prepared to meet the question, why not leave the bill before the Senate, to take its chance with the other business that is to come up? He is, confessedly, unalterably opposed to it; and why should he want to delay it, if it is not merely to dispose of the question indirectly? Why postpone it? The next session will be the short session, and it will be said we have not time to take it up; and so it will be defeated again. I hope the Senate will act at once on the subject.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to make a remark or two, in reply to what has fallen from the Senator from Tennessee, before the vote is taken on this bill. He argues that public opinion is in favor of this measure, and therefore it ought to be passed; but, admitting his premises, I do not agree that his conclusion is necessary. I do not think it is the business of this Senate, or of the House of Representatives, merely to reflect public opinion, whether right or wrong. I do not think it becomes us, as representatives of sovereign States, to run after public opinion; but I think we should rather lead it; we should correct it when it is wrong, and should only follow it when it accords with our judgment, and when it is right.

Now, in respect to this homestead policy, which the Senator says has been approved by public opinion. I dissent from him as to that conclusion. I deny that it is approved by public judgment. Why, sir, fourteen years ago, an unfortunate son of genius, who represented one of the districts in my own State, originated the idea in this country of giving homes to the homeless. Felix G. McConnell, of the State of Alabama, was in the habit, I believe, on all occasions when he rose to address the Speaker of the House of Representatives, of suggesting his proposition for a homestead for every man, matron, and maid in the United States, who was the head of a family. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMLIN. And widow.

Mr. CLAY. Then it was treated with derision. About eight years ago, the Senator from New York, who perhaps is entitled to the credit of originating this measure in the Senate, offered a bill, of which this is a substantial copy, perhaps a literal one, and it received but two votes.

Mr. SEWARD. That is all.

Mr. CLAY. His vote and that of the then Senator from Wisconsin, (Mr. Walker.) Now, sir, whence did this cry for land originate? Not among the people, but among their Representatives. The public voice we hear is a mere echo of the voice that was first raised in this body, or in the other end of this Capitol. At one time I believe there was a large majority of the people of my own State who favored this proposition. It was very natural that they should favor it. When I came into the Senate the larger portion of the lands within my State belonged to the Federal Government, or rather to the people of the United States. A proposition to give a home to every man who would go and settle upon it free of charge, was, of course, a very acceptable one. "Every man is a friend to him who giveth gifts," we are told by Solomon, and such I found to be my experience in canvassing the district in which I resided. A large majority, I believe, at that time were in favor of a homestead policy; and they had a better excuse for favoring that policy than can be preferred in most other States.

The best lands in that State had been long sold. Inferior and sterile lands, which were worth little for the purpose of cultivation, and only valuable for their minerals, were then in market. They were unwilling, and in many instances unable, perhaps, to give $1 25 an acre for land which would scarcely sprout peas; and hence there was a general cry for this homestead policy. But since that time, in the year 1854, we passed the graduation bill. Under that bill, lands which have been in market for ten years, and unsold, are reduced from $1 25 to one dollar an acre; lands which have been in market fifteen years have been reduced to seventy-five cents an acre; twenty years, to fifty cents an acre; twenty-five, to twenty-five cents; and thirty to twelve and a half cents. Under this policy, there is not a foot of land within my State that is now at the maximum price of $1 25. There is an inconsiderable portion held at a dollar an acre. The largest portion is reduced to twelve and a half cents; and almost any land can be had at fifty cents an acre.

Now, sir, the people are satisfied with this reduction. They do not ask that the land shall be given to them for nothing; they see that it has been reduced according to its value; and they are willing to pay its value; and I believe at this time this homestead policy would receive a very small vote among the people of the State of Alabama. I think that it will not obtain a single vote among the Representatives of that State in the other House of Congress. The same facts are true of the other southern land States, as they are generally termed; and I think ought to be true of the older northern land States.

Hence there is, at this time, not the same reason for pressing this measure that existed four years ago. Since then we have reduced the lands, by a gradual scale, to such a price that any man who is worthy of a home can buy it; for I hold that any man who is not willing to give twelve and a half cents, or even $1 25, an acre for lands, under the preemption plan, is not entitled to a home, does not deserve one as a gift, and would not cultivate it well if you were to give it to him. Why, sir, under the preemption law, one may take possession of a tract of land, as I understand the law, and hold it for twelve months—after giving notice of his entry—before he is required to make any payment; and, if he has any industry and energy and health, in that period of time he can raise the money to pay for his land. The man who is not willing to do that, or will not take a tract of land at twelve and a half cents an acre of the Government, I say, is not worthy of having it given to him. Because that bill has passed, and because I believe the people of my own State have changed their views on this subject, I deny that, at this time, we have any proof that the public voice demands the passage of this bill.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I think, sir, that the honorable Senator from New York has furnished us an additional reason why we should vote at once for the postponement of this bill. He proposes to prolong this session; and one of the reasons assigned for it, and, perhaps—from the manner the gentleman has spoken—his principal reason, is, that we may have time to discuss the homestead bill.

Mr. SEWARD. Not to discuss it, but to pass it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. That involves discussion. Now, sir, I am not, and I think the majority of the Senate are not, willing, upon such grounds, to propose a prolongation of the session. I am not willing to do it. There must be some measure of most urgent and pressing necessity that will induce me to vote for the prolongation of the session a single day; and if that reason is to be urged, it is only one additional consideration with me for answering such arguments at once for the continuance of the session by putting this measure out of the way.

Mr. President, it is a very important subject. The present bill, it seems to me, as I have very imperfectly stated before, is liable to objection. It gives indiscriminately to rich and poor. It does not provide for the homeless and the houseless only; it gives indiscriminately to the rich and to the poor. The object which seems to be the principal inducement of the honorable Senator from Tennessee to press this bill may possibly be accomplished by some modification of the measure. A part of this object addresses itself very strongly to our humanity, and I hope I shall never be deaf to that point. It may address itself in some form or shape to the true policy of the country; I do not say that it may not, at any rate; but, in its present form, it cannot pass. It must undergo material modification, I think, before it can pass the Senate; and sound discriminations must be made that the bill does not attempt.

But there is, in the front of all these objections, one that seems to me to be decisive. The proceeds of the public lands have formed a part of the Treasury estimates on which we have been acting and making appropriations. To give away the public lands as proposed will altogether exclude, or nearly so, that source of revenue, or at least it will so materially diminish it that all these calculations will have to be gone over again; and if we intend to adjust our appropriations to our income all must be revised and looked into. We have not time to do that now. We have not time to act on this subject and debate this bill, and if it be adopted, to remodel our measures so as to agree to it.

But, the manifest objection to it now is, that we require all the money that can be obtained from the public lands and from all other sources, and in addition to that we are borrowing money. Is this the time to give money out of the Treasury? for it is the same thing to give money or to give the subject which produces the money. Is this the time when we can enter upon it? A time could not be selected in the history of our country more inauspicious to the success of the measure. I hope we shall postpone it until January.

Mr. PUGH. I think, considering the state of the public business and the late hour of this session, we ought to come to a decisive vote on this bill; but we never can have a test vote in the Senate as long as the question is open to debate. If the majority of the Senate be opposed to the bill, we ought not to waste any time in discussing it. To bring the Senate to a vote which will be decisive, I make a motion, for which I shall not vote. I move that the bill lie on the table, and I call for the yeas and nays. ["No," "No."] If the Senate will vote on the postponement, I will not press this motion; but if there is to be debate on the other, I shall insist upon it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Let us vote on the other motion.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senate are opposed to the bill, let them lay it on the table.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Let the Senator see whether we can have a vote on the other motion first; and if the debate be unreasonably continued he can renew his motion.

Mr. PUGH. I withdraw it at the suggestion of Senators.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. DOOLITTLE, has paired off with the Senator from Texas, Mr. HENDERSON.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I shall vote for the postponement with a view to move a reconsideration.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Green, Hamlin, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Reid, Sebastian, Shidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wright—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bright, Broderick, Chandler, Douglas, Durkee, Fitch, Foot, Hale, Hamlin, Jones, King, Pugh, Rice, Seward, Shields, Simmons, Stuart, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I move to reconsider the vote by which the homestead bill was postponed until January. Let the motion be entered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to ask whether there is any special order now? What is the business before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. IVERSON.) The next special order is the bill (S. No. 85) supplementary to the act entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal acts therein mentioned," approved April 20, 1818.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to postpone all special orders for the purpose of continuing the discussion of the bill for the improvement of the harbor of Sheboygan, and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays. I wish to say to the friends of these improvements that it is very certain that, if the session should not be prolonged, this is the last day upon which there can be a hope of securing the passage of these bills, and that, with a view to securing their passage, I have abstained altogether from saying one word in the debate. I hope that the same course may be adopted by the friends of the measures; for whether we are willing it shall be so or not, probably a vote against continuing the consideration of the bills to-day will be decisive of their fate.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senate will refuse to agree to that motion; and if they do, I shall ask to take up the civil appropriation bill.

Mr. FOOT. I rise to inquire what is the first special order now pending before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first special order is a joint resolution (S. No. 7) directing the presentation of a medal to Commodore Paulding. That comes up in connection with the report and resolution of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the bill (S. No. 85) reported by that committee.

Mr. FOOT. Upon the several questions presented by the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to be heard, perhaps at some length; but I am willing to consult the views of the Senate as to the time. I am quite prepared to go on at the present time, or, if desired by the Senate, I am willing it should be postponed until to-morrow, or even the next day; but I should hope it would not be postponed to a very late day. I will defer entirely to the wishes of the Senate on the subject.

Mr. MASON. The report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, or, more properly, the bill accompanying that report, was made the special order three months ago. I have not disturbed it in its place on the Calendar, relying, and I thought with some confidence, that when it was reached on the Calendar it would be taken up. The bill is intended more fully to provide for the preservation of the peace of the country, in our relations with foreign countries—a matter that I consider of very great interest, and I should be averse to its being postponed for any proposition whatever, unless it should be the determination of the Senate to pass the appropriation bills and adjourn, which I should deprecate if it is to put this bill out of its proper place. I would say to the Senator from Vermont, therefore, he had better allow it to remain as it is; and I hope it will not be postponed, but will come up in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to postpone the special orders, with a view to continue the consideration of the harbor bills.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HUNTER. I give notice that if this motion fails, I shall ask the Senate to take up the appropriation bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I give notice, if this bill be passed, that I shall move to take up all the other harbor bills.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SEWARD. I ought to have stated some time ago that the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. CAMERON, has been absent two days, and paired off, to my knowledge, on all these questions, with some Senator whose name I do not remember.

Mr. FITCH. On these river and harbor questions I have paired off with the Senator from Louisiana, Mr. BENJAMIN.

The result was then announced—yeas 26, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Bigler, Broderick, Chandler, Crittenden, Dixon, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Jones, Kennedy, King, Pugh, Seward, Shields, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bright, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Reid, Rice, Shidell, Toombs, and Wright—20.

The Senate accordingly resumed the consideration of the Sheboygan harbor bill, and the discussion continued to a late hour. Without disposing of the subject, the Senate adjourned.

[This debate will be published in the Appendix.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 27, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. D. BALL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PREEMPTION RIGHTS.

Mr. COBB. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have printed a bill and report from the Committee on Public Lands, in relation to preemption rights on the public lands. I desire that they may be printed for the information of the House and country. The Committee on Public Lands will report the bill if they can get an opportunity to do so.

Mr. CLEMENS. If there is no quorum present, I move a call of the House. I object to any business being done until it is ascertained that there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

The Chair counted the House, and announced that there were one hundred and twenty-one members present.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman does not object to my request?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not object to that.

The bill and report were then ordered to be printed.

BANKRUPT LAWS.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to be allowed to submit a report, accompanied by a resolution, from the Committee on the Judiciary, in reference to the enactment of a bankrupt law, to embrace corporations, that they may be laid on the table and printed.

The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That there be no further action upon the recommendation of the President "to pass a uniform bankrupt law, applicable to all banking institutions throughout the United States."

No objection being made, the report and resolution were received, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to say that, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, I concurred in the resolution reported by the gentleman from Louisiana, but did not concur in many of the reasons upon which that conclusion was reached by the committee. I had intended to prepare a short report to submit, but have been so pressed with other business that I have not been able to do so. I will say, however, that there is a minority report prepared by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. CASKIE,) a member of that committee. I ask that the minority have leave to file their views, and that they be printed with the majority report.

It was so ordered.

Mr. DAWES. I move that five thousand extra copies of the majority report and resolution, and of the views of the minority, be printed.

The motion was referred to the Committee on Printing, under the rules.

FORTIFICATIONS.

Mr. LANDY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill making appropriations for the completion and repair of fortifications, as recommended by the Secretary of War, for the purpose of reference merely.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the regular order of business is called for.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is a motion to lay upon the table a motion to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered upon the naval appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1859, and the amendments thereto, reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The first, second, and third amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, were read, and agreed to.

Fourth amendment:

In the clause in relation to the New York navy-yard, after the word "yard," in line one hundred and two, insert "and filling in the new purchase," and strike out "$369,516," and insert in lieu thereof "$320,166," so that it will read:

For boiler-house and setting boilers, water-pipes, drains, quay work, sewer extended to quay wall, boiler to dredger, timber basin, repairs of oakum shop, filling ponds in yard, filling in the new purchase, dredging channel, and scows, piling site for marine barracks, machinery for machine shop, boiler-shop, saw-mill, foundry, smithery, and brass foundry, and repairs of all kinds, $320,166.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for a division on the amendment.

Mr. GREENWOOD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WINSLOW and BUFFINGTON were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 39.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. RUFFIN called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HAWKINS and WALDRON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported thirty-nine in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 109; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Bishop, Bocoock, Bowie, Burroughs, Cavanaugh, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clemens, John Cochran, Comins, Corning, Cox, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Dean, Dimmick, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, Florence, Foster, Goode, Goodwin, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Huyler, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelsey, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, Humphrey Marshall, Millson, Freeman H. Morse, Niblack, Nichols, Palmer, John S. Phelps, Potte, Reagan, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Sealing, Seward, Shorter, Sickles, Spinner, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—64.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Boyce, Branch, Bratton, Buffington, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Case, Chaffee, Clark B. Cochran, Colfax, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dodd, English, Farnsworth, Foley, Gartrell, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Granger, Grow, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hill, Horton, Houston, Howard, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Knapp, Leiter, Lovejoy, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Maynard, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Parker, Pettit, Peyton, Phillips, Pike, Potte, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Ricand, Ritchie, Royce, Rufin, Seales, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stanton, William Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Vallandigham, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Watkins, White, Wilson, Woodson, and Zollcoffer—109.

So the amendment was rejected.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. CASE stated that Messrs. LAWRENCE and KILGORE were absent from the House on committee business, and had paired off.

The fifth amendment was then agreed to.

Sixth amendment:

To continue and carry on the work as contemplated by the act approved January 23, 1857, authorizing the establishing of a naval depot on Blith Island, at Brunswick, on the coast of Georgia, $300,000.

Mr. SEWARD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 114; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Andrews, Arnold, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Clawson, Clemens, Clark B. Cochran, John Cochran, Comins, Cragin, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Massachusetts, Dean, Dowdell, Edmundson, Florence, Foster, Gartrell, Gilman, Gilmer, Greenwood, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Jackson, Kellogg, Kelsey, John C. Kunkel, Maclay, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Palmer, Potter, Purviance, Ready, Reagan, Russell, Sandidge, Seward, Shorter, Sickles, Samuel A. Smith, James A. Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tripp, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Israel Washburn, Winslow, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bocoock, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bratton, Buffington, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Caruthers, Cavanaugh, John B. Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cockerill, Colfax, Corning, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Edie, Elliott, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Gooch, Goode, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Huyler, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Morgan, Isaac N. Morris, Parker, Pettit, Peyton, John S. Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Potte, Powell, Quitman, Reilly, Ricand, Robbins, Roberts, Ruffin, Seales, Sealing, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Singleton, Robert Smith, William Smith, Stanton, William Stewart, Talbot, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Vallandigham, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Elihu B. Washburne, Watkins, White, Wilson, Wood, Woodson, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—114.

So the amendment was rejected.

The remaining amendments made in Committee of the Whole were then agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bingham, Bocoock, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bratton, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, Cavanaugh, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, John Cochran, Cockerill, Comins, Corning, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dinanick, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, Elliott, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Goode, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hawkins, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Lawrence, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Miles, Miller, Millson, Moore, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Nichols, Peyton, John S. Phelps, Phillips, Pike, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Scott, Sealing, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Underwood, Vallandigham, Watkins, White, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—110.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Blair, Bliss, Buffington, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Clawson, Cobb, Clark B. Cochran, Colfax, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilmer, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Hill, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Murray, Palmer, Pettit, Pike, Potte, Purviance, Ready, Ricand, Roberts, Royce, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Wilson, and Zollcoffer—75.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. ENGLISH stated, during the call of the roll, that he was not within the bar when his name was called, or he should have voted for the bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was received, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (No. 341) making appropriations for repairing and securing the works at the harbor of Chicago, Illinois.

An act (No. 342) making appropriations for the preservation and repair of the piers at the mouth of Milwaukee river, Wisconsin.

An act (No. 396) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000.

Also, that the Senate had passed the joint resolution of the House (No. 32) making appropriations to pay the expenses of the several investigating committees of the House of Representatives.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 32) making appropriations to pay the expenses of the several investigating committees of the House of Representatives, when the Speaker signed the same.

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the House bill (No. 466) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenues from customs, reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the following amendment:

At the end of the bill add as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to the next session of Congress a plan and estimates for reducing the expenses of the collection of the revenue, in accordance with the general recommendations of his last annual report.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to know if this bill does not make a permanent appropriation of over four million dollars? I think that is the effect of it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The previous question has been demanded, and debate is not in order.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to know if this bill does not appropriate $1,000,000 more than has ever been expended for this service?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COLFAX. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 61, noes 85.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. RICAUD demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 92; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Arnold, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, Cavanaugh, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, John Cochran, Cockerill, Comins, Corning, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keith, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Maclay, McQueen, Mason, Miller, Millson, Moore, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Roberts, Ruffin, Savage, Seales, Sealing, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Vallandigham, Watkins, White, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bratton, Buffington, Burlingame, Caruthers, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochran, Colfax, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leiter, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potte, Purviance, Ricand, Ritchie, Royce, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Isaac Washburn, Wilson, Wood, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—92.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COLFAX. I desire to amend the title.

The SPEAKER. The title has already been passed on.

Mr. COLFAX. I was on the floor, and tried to move the amendment in time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is sorry he did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. COLFAX. I wished to amend the title so as to make it read, "An act increasing the appropriations for collecting the revenues from customs."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I object to that. It does not increase the appropriations one dollar.

TARIFF INVESTIGATION.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to submit a report from the tariff investigating committee, accompanied by a resolution, for the purpose of having it printed.

The resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that the report, with the evidence, be printed.

Mr. MOORE. I ask to submit a minority report.

Mr. PURVANCE. Not concurring in the views of the majority, I desire to submit another minority report.

Mr. STANTON. Very well; I will modify the resolution so as to embrace both minority reports, and will call the previous question.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I wish to know if there is any other resolution accompanying the report?

Mr. STANTON. There is not.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. STANTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DELEGATE FROM MINNESOTA.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I rise to a question of privilege. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be authorized to inquire into and report upon the right of W. W. Kingsbury to a seat upon this floor as Delegate from that part of the Territory of Minnesota outside the State limits.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I wish, in connection with that proposition, to present the memorial of Mr. Alpheus G. Fuller, asking admission to a seat in the House of Representatives, from the same portion of the Territory, with his credentials; and move that they be referred at the same time to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. KELSEY. I arise to a question of order. Is it in order to present the credentials of anybody claiming a seat in the House as a Delegate from a Territory, when we know that no such Territory has ever been organized by Congress? I submit that the proposition cannot be entertained as a question of privilege, because we know judicially that no such territorial government exists. I make the point that the resolution cannot be received as a question of privilege.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Missouri. I submit this point: that the State of Minnesota does not embrace the whole of the territory included in the Territory of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in response to the gentleman from New York, will say that some two or three days ago he was embarrassed as to the propriety of recognizing the Delegate from Minnesota, Mr. Kingsbury, who has continued to occupy a seat upon the floor as a Delegate from the Territory of Minnesota. The Chair took it for granted that when the Territory was admitted into the Union as a State, the person theretofore occupying a seat as Delegate ceased to hold any such position. But somewhat to his surprise, in looking back into the history of two or three precedents, he found that Delegates had been allowed to retain their seats after the States had been admitted. Such was the fact in Michigan and Wisconsin. But for the precedents the Chair would have sustained the question of order; but in view of them he will be constrained to overrule the question of order; and he would be very glad to have the House relieve him from the responsibility of deciding whether the gentleman who was the Delegate from the former Territory of Minnesota shall be recognized or not.

Mr. KELSEY. I desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair; and it is for the purpose of having the question decided at once. I suppose it is a question upon which no new light will be thrown by reference.

Mr. HARRIS, from Illinois. Is this appeal debatable?

Mr. KELSEY. I have the right to state the grounds of my appeal. I wish to state that these precedents, I have no doubt, are in cases where no attention has been called to them.

Mr. GROW. If the gentleman will allow me a moment further. He will find in the case of Sibley, who came here as a Delegate from the portion of Wisconsin Territory left out when Wisconsin was admitted as a State, that there was a controversy on the question; that it was referred to the Committee of Elections, and that majority and minority reports were made to the House. He will find the report in the reports of the Committee of Elections for the second session of the Thirtieth Congress. There are in that instance two cases cited where Delegates were admitted when portions of Territories were left out on the admission of new States.

Mr. KELSEY. That should not bind this House, for the reason that there is now no territorial organization in existence known as the Territory of Minnesota, and this Delegate can represent no territorial organization unless it is one created by Congress.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be reported, and the gentleman will see that it does not conflict with his view of the question.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. KELSEY. Having drawn out this information from various gentlemen, I now withdraw my appeal, and hope that the whole subject will be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it in order to move that this matter be referred to the Committee on Territories?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HUGHES. The question is, whether there is a territorial organization there or not?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am satisfied that there is no Territory there, and I therefore move that the whole subject be laid upon the table.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BOCK. With the consent of the gentleman from Illinois, I would like to ask a question.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a point of order. My question of order is this: The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CAVANAUGH] submits a resolution of inquiry as to the right of the Delegate from Minnesota to sit upon this floor. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] then presents the credentials of some other party claiming to represent the same Territory, and he calls for the previous question on the motion to refer those credentials to the Committee of Elections. I submit that these two questions are totally foreign to and different from each other. The question as to whether Mr. Kingsbury has a right to a seat upon this floor as a Delegate from that portion of the Territory of Minnesota not embraced within the limits of the present State, is a very different question from that whether Mr. Fuller has been duly elected. The one question ought to go to the Committee of Elections; and the other ought to be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken by the gentleman, that both subjects cannot be disposed of together, except by the consent of the House. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] however, can present those credentials after the resolution shall have been presented.

Mr. BOCK. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, I will propound a question with a view to see whether a difficulty which may arise, could be obviated. I want to know what will be the condition of the gentleman who makes the claim here; whether he will be recognized as a member of this House while this investigation is pending? Will Mr. Kingsbury, in the mean time, and while this investigation is going on, be a member of this House? I propose to add the proviso, that until the committee reports, there shall be no Delegate recognized from that Territory upon this floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The resolution to which the gentleman has referred was introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. CAVANAUGH,] and not by myself; and of course I have no control over it. If the gentleman wishes to propose that amendment, I will withdraw the call for the previous question, in order that he may do it.

Mr. BOCK. I propose the amendment I have suggested.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I accept the amendment as a modification of my proposition.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. We have other business to attend to; and as I am not disposed to unnecessarily occupy the time of the House with this matter, I renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. Before voting on the credentials presented by the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to have them read. My impression is that they do not come from any organization or pretended organization of the inhabitants of Minnesota, but from an organization in Dacotah.

Mr. GROW. There are some five or six organized counties—

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I withdraw the call for the previous question, to state to the gentleman that there were two organized counties outside of the limits of the State, and some four counties created by law, but which were not formally organized, but in which people were residing.

Mr. KELSEY. With the gentleman's permission, I will ask him a question. Is there any Governor, Secretary, or Legislative Assembly there now, for this Territory of Minnesota or Dacotah?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. There are officers in these counties to which I have referred who have been appointed and elected in conformity with law, and are now performing their official functions. How numerous the population is, I do not know, nor is it necessary to inquire.

Mr. KELSEY. Are they not county, and not territorial officers?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. They are county officers, deriving their authority from the territorial power of Minnesota, and acting in conformity with law.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I would like to inquire whether the counties referred to were within the limits of Minnesota?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If the gentleman had paid attention, he would have heard me state that they are not within the present limits of the State of Minnesota, but altogether outside of it. The sitting Delegate claims that he represents the people outside of the State limits, and who assisted in his election; and according to the precedent he ought to hold his position as their Delegate. On the other hand, I present the memorial, the facts embraced in which I know nothing about, setting up that Mr. Fuller was elected by the people of the same counties, and ought to represent them. I renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. To what does the call for previous question apply?

The SPEAKER. Only to the resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I desire to move that the other branch be referred to the Committee on Territories, in order that we have a report from that committee whether there is, or not, a territorial organization there.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will answer the gentleman that there is no regular territorial organization there.

Mr. HOUSTON. I make the motion that it be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. DEAN. Is debate in order.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. DEAN. Then I object.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The motion to refer to the Committee of Elections has precedence.

The SPEAKER. There is no other motion pending.

Mr. HUGHES. I moved to refer to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. The motion could not be entertained, because the previous question was pending.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The previous question called by myself was upon the resolution presented by the gentleman from Minnesota, and not upon the other, for it is not before the House.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a question of order, which I wish to present to the consideration of the Chair, as I regard it of grave importance. A Delegate from Minnesota has already been admitted to his seat, and now holds it unless he has been excluded by operation of law in consequence of the admission of the State of Minnesota; and I submit that it is not in order to offer a resolution which contains a clause that the Territory shall not have a Delegate upon this floor until the resolution is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is perfectly competent for a resolution to be introduced referring to the Committee of Elections the question whether any person is entitled to a seat upon this floor.

Mr. HUGHES. But this resolution contains a clause that no person shall have a seat upon this floor until the resolution is disposed of.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I now ask that the papers presented on behalf of Mr. Fuller may take the same reference.

It was so ordered.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. WINSLOW. I desire to know whether, under the 137th rule of the House, a motion to suspend the rules would not now be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WINSLOW. Then I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report a bill from the Committee on the Library. It is a very important one.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Am I not entitled to the floor? It was taken from me by a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to the floor if he claims it.

Mr. WINSLOW. How does he get it?

The SPEAKER. The floor was taken from the gentleman by the gentleman from Ohio, who rose to a privileged question.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will yield to the gentleman a moment. My object was to retain the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to the gentleman yielding the floor, unless he yields it absolutely.

Mr. WINSLOW. I presume the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee can get the floor whenever he desires it, and I appeal to him to yield to me to report a very important bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I yield the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. I will waive my objection.

Mr. WINSLOW then, by unanimous consent, reported, from the Committee on the Library, a bill to provide for keeping and distributing the public documents; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was then read in extenso.

Mr. KELSEY. I think that bill had better be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is too important a bill to be passed without consideration.

Mr. WINSLOW. I think I can satisfy the House by a very few remarks in regard to the details of this bill.

Mr. KELSEY. It is also suggested that the bill contains an appropriation.

Mr. WINSLOW. The bill contains no appropriation. It simply transfers a loan already made.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I object to the consideration of that bill now.

Mr. WINSLOW. I hope the gentleman will allow me to explain the bill.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Not now.

Mr. WINSLOW. I move, then, that the bill be recommitted to the Joint Committee on the Library, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

OUTRAGES ON THE AMERICAN FLAG, ETC.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to ask leave to bring in, by unanimous consent, a bill, which I shall send to the Clerk's desk, and which I intend to ask, if leave is granted, shall be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I ask that it may now be read for information.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. CLAY. I ask that it may be reported.

The bill was read by its title, as follows:

"A bill to restrain and redress outrages upon the flag and citizens of the United States."

Mr. GARNETT. I object.

Mr. CLAY. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order to-day.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means, the Senate amendment to the consular and diplomatic bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I object; and I hope no gentleman will ask me to withdraw my objection.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, whether my friend from Georgia objects or not.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I move that the House proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania must be first put.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I wish to state to the House that I will submit my motion if the other is voted down.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Before my motion is put, I desire to say that the Post Office bill has been under consideration for some time, and I move to terminate debate thereon in five minutes after the committee shall again resume its consideration.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose there will be no objection to act that bill into the House, to act upon it here. I think it was read through in committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the bill has been read through by paragraphs in Committee of the Whole. It is proposed by the gentleman from Alabama that, by unanimous consent, the Committee of the Whole be discharged from its further consideration; and that the bill be reported to the House with a view to its being put upon its passage.

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

The resolution to close debate upon the bill in five minutes was adopted.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now insist on my motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Houston in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The bill has been read through for amendments. I move that it be laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to know if the bill is now subject to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has been read through, and there is no amendment pending. The bill, however, is open to amendment by additions.

Mr. BLAIR. I move, then, to amend by adding a proviso to the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. The first section is not open to amendment. The bill having been read through, it is not in order to go back.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I offer the following as a proviso, to come in at the end of the bill:

Provided, however, That the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1857, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1858, and which authorizes the Postmaster General "to contract for the conveyance of the entire letter mail from such points on the Mississippi river as the contractors may select, to San Francisco," be so construed as to allow said contractors to carry said mail by such routes as they may select, anything to the contrary in the contract made by the Postmaster General with John Butterfield and others, on the 16th day of September, 1857, notwithstanding.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I make the point of order that that is legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is not in order; it proposes legislation.

Mr. BLAIR. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment out of order because it proposes legislation in the construction of a previously enacted law.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to state the grounds of my appeal, without arguing it. The amendment relates to a law now in existence, which this Congress has a right to construe, and the proviso limits the appropriation and construes the law in its obvious sense.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I must object to debate. I have no objection to anything else. The gentleman has a right to state his point of order, but not to debate it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

At this point the committee rose informally, and the Speaker having resumed the chair a message was received from the Senate by Mr. DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. Also, that the Senate had passed the bill of the House for the relief of B. W. Palmer and others, with an amendment; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that a committee of conference may be ordered on the bill that has just come back.

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not object, unless he wants to remain here a month or two longer.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not care how long I stay here; but I do not see why we should legislate exclusively for the Departments.

Mr. LETCHER. There are other interests than that in the bill.

The committee then resumed its session.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. BLAIR. I have appealed from the decision of the Chair because this proviso limits the appropriation and construes a law passed by the last Congress, and gives it a construction according to its obvious sense and intention. I hold that it is therefore in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the amendment out of order because it gives a construction to an existing law different from the construction given to it, as the Chair understands, by the Department that has power to construe it; and that being the case, the Chair decides that it is equivalent to the enactment of a new law.

The question was taken on the appeal; and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. SEWARD. I offer the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That no part of the money appropriated by the preceding section of this act shall be used until the expenditures of the Government fall within the receipts of revenue collected under the present tariff act.

Mr. ENGLISH. I submit that that amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes that the amendment is liable to the same objection which was presented to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I will state my reasons.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to state his point of order.

Mr. SEWARD. There is no law now in existence providing for this deficiency of $3,500,000 in the Post Office appropriations, provided for in this bill; and, if the appropriation is made, I desire to put a limitation upon it, that the money shall not be used until a sufficient amount of money is collected under your tariff system to pay the expenses of the Government.

Mr. BISHOP. Is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, sir, I will only say that the amendment changes no law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment out of order, because he believes it changes existing laws.

Mr. COLFAX. I tried last evening to get the floor, for the purpose of making a motion which I now make. I now move to strike out, in the second section, "$3,500,000," and insert "$1,500,000."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. You cannot go back. The committee has passed that section.

Mr. COLFAX. I have been trying to get the floor to introduce this amendment since the section was first read, and I cannot be ruled out in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, upon reflection, thinks that as the section is composed of a single paragraph, it may be in order to amend it.

Mr. COLFAX. I move, then, that the appropriation in the second section, to supply deficiencies in the Post Office revenue, be reduced from $3,500,000 to $1,500,000.

I know gentlemen will tell me that this is not a sufficient amount. I know it is not sufficient; but at the close of these remarks I shall make an additional motion, which will directly increase the revenues of the Post Office Department. I should have made it now, but I thought it would be ruled out of order, as nearly all my motions looking to retrenchment and reform have been.

Now, sir, my proposition is to abolish the franking privilege, and I hope the House will sustain me in the motion. It is not only an expensive burden upon the mails, but it is a great burden upon the members themselves. I know I shall be told that this is all for Buncombe; but I ask members if what I have said is not correct? as long as it exists members are expected to answer almost innumerable letters, many of them written because they are free of postage, until it is almost necessary for a member to employ a secretary to transact this description of business.

Now, sir, if you will abolish the franking privilege, as the British Government has done, I think the postages will defray, or very nearly defray, the expenses of the Post Office Department. But while it exists, and while the people expect us to send them public documents, speeches, seeds, &c., we shall all exercise our rights under the law, of course.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] yesterday proposed his plan for the purpose of supplying the deficiencies which have arisen in the Post Office Department, which was to increase the rates of postage on letters to five cents instead of three. Now, I prefer, instead of increasing taxes on the people, to try another sort of reform, by making all mail matter pay postage, and see if that will not replenish the exhausted coffers of the Post Office Department. You may, if you think proper, provide that public documents shall go through the mails free of postage. Let this be done upon their being stamped by the Departments by which they were issued, and it will not interfere with the principle. And now, having explained the reasons for my course, I move still further to amend by adding at the end of my amendment the following: which I think is clearly in order, if anything intended to make our receipts equal to our expenditures is in order here:

And that, to aid in rendering the revenues of the Department sufficient to meet the appropriations of this act, the franking privilege is hereby abolished.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, and I hope the vote will be taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to rule the amendment, as now offered, out of order. The Chair thinks that a proposition to abolish the franking privilege is a change of existing law, and not in order to an appropriation bill.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I move to add the following at the end of the section:

Provided, That no part of the appropriation contained in line nineteen shall be applied in payment for advertising for mail proposals in more than one paper in the city of Washington.

Mr. ENGLISH. I think I should be in favor of the proposition of my friend, if it is in order; but it is in violation of existing law, and therefore out of order. I submit the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment provides for changing the existing law, and he will be compelled to rule it out of order.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope the amendment will be received by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDIE. I object.

There being no further amendments proposed to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to take up the bill of the House (No. 243) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was taken up for consideration.

On motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, by unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with, and the reading by clauses, for amendment, commenced.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I wish to state my reasons for opposing this bill, and also the bill authorizing a loan of $15,000,000. It is with some reluctance that I trespass upon the time of the House at this period of its session; and I will make my remarks as brief as possible. I do not know that any other opportunity will occur, and I shall therefore embrace the present.

On the first day of July last there was a surplus of $17,710,114 in the Treasury. This surplus has been reduced to the shadow of a shade. The Secretary of the Treasury in December last, in a message calling for an issue of $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, told us that in all probability but a small part, if any, of the amount would be needed at an early day; yet, now, we have another message from that same officer, in which he tells us that—

"The $20,000,000 loan of Treasury notes, authorized by the act of December 23, 1857, will be exhausted in supplying the deficiencies in the Treasury for the present fiscal year."

"We shall commence the next fiscal year dependent entirely upon the current receipts into the Treasury to meet all demands from it."

So, for the first year of this Administration, we have, in addition to the current revenue, an old balance of $17,000,000, and $20,000,000 of Treasury notes already expended and gone. We have a deficiency of $37,000,000 in a single year; and we are now called on by the Administration for another loan of $15,000,000. And, sir, we are told that this loan will not meet the exigency—it is only a partial remedy, a homeopathic dose. The Secretary gives us fair notice that he will want further loans during the next fiscal year. I will call the attention of the committee to this clause of his letter:

"I have confined this inquiry to the two first quarters of the next fiscal year, as Congress will reassemble before the close of the second quarter, and it will be time enough then, should it become necessary, to provide for future contingencies that cannot now be foreseen."

"Future contingencies that cannot now be foreseen!" Is the Secretary like Micawber, waiting for "something to turn up?" Sir, these future contingencies can be foreseen. I can demonstrate to any sensible man that the Secretary of the Treasury will be compelled to call on Congress for $42,000,000 to supply deficiencies in the next fiscal year. To that will have to be added $21,000,000 to redeem the outstanding Treasury notes and interest, which run but for one year, so that there will be an addition to the national debt of $63,000,000 in two years.

Under these circumstances, a loan bill is proposed to the House, and it is not accompanied by any measure of revenue, or of retrenchment and reform. No proposition is made to increase the tariff, no measure to enlarge the revenue. As the first fruits of this Administration, we are embarked in a permanent system of loans to support the Government.

I desire, for a moment, to call the attention of the committee to another remarkable paragraph of the Secretary's letter. He says that since the meeting of Congress "the demands upon the Treasury for the present fiscal year have been increased by legislation to an amount not far below ten million dollars."

I would like to know by what legislation we have increased the burden thrown upon the Treasury. Has the Committee of Ways and Means introduced measures into this House appropriating $10,000,000 not sanctioned by the Executive? Has any act been approved by the House which appropriates $10,000,000 not called for by the Secretary of the Treasury? If Congress has thrown an additional burden upon the Executive Departments I would like to know by what law and for what purpose it has been done. I have no knowledge of any bill which has not been demanded and urged upon us by the Executive. Certainly Congress has proposed no new expenditure. But the Secretary says this has been done by legislation. We did pass a deficiency bill, and that I suppose is the legislation referred to. But at whose demand? We all know how urgently these executive officers, who now seek to charge that Congress has thrown upon the Treasury an additional burden, begged us to pass the deficiency bill. And what was this deficiency for? To carry on the Utah war—a purely executive war—a war made and carried on without the assent of Congress. An improvident war—a war as feeble in its conception as it is likely to be ridiculous in its termination. With great clat, and at great expense, the Administration gathered together an army in the Territory of Kansas to overawe that people, and retained it there until a period too late to march to Utah before the approaching winter. With utter disregard of either policy or economy, the President then ordered forward our gallant army to spend the winter in the Rocky Mountains. He did not wait until Congress could be consulted. Instead of sending peace commissioners to reason with a rebellious people and negotiate terms of peace, he posted this army in the mountains and compelled them to be supported there with flour at fifty dollars a barrel, and other provisions at an equally enormous rate. After millions have thus been wasted, he discovers for the first time that negotiation might prevent the war; and then, with ridiculous haste, commissioners are dispatched to overtake the army. Recent advices indicate that a private citizen has accomplished what the Administration too late attempted, and thus the Treasury has been burdened by the useless expenditure of millions of treasure by an unauthorized act of executive power.

Mr. Chairman, I now desire to submit to the committee some remarks in regard to the expenditures of our Government; and to show their increase, and where we are drifting to. The expenditures of the last fiscal year, according to the documents which we have before us, were $71,072,213, inclusive of payments on the public debt; and $65,032,559, exclusive of the public debt. This is several millions more than was expended for any year during the Mexican war. I have endeavored to estimate, as nearly as I could, the expenditures for this current fiscal year; and, in doing so, I have taken the materials furnished us by the Committee of Ways and Means. I find that, at the third session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, $72,112,293 were appropriated; for this year, I find that the Committee of Ways and Means has increased this sum by deficiency bills, amounting to $11,201,701, composed of the following items:

Sound-duties by treaty with Denmark.....	$333,011
Printing deficiency already passed.....	341,188
Balance of Printing deficiency for this year, (estimated).....	600,000
Miscellaneous.....	373,318
Army deficiency.....	7,925,000
Post Office deficiency.....	1,469,173
	$11,201,701

Amounting in all to $83,313,999. This sum has been appropriated, except the $600,000 for printing, and has nearly all been expended. Secretary Cobb makes the estimate a little higher, or near eighty-five million dollars. Thus far the estimated expenditures by annual report are $74,963,058; add $10,000,000 mentioned in his recent letter as for deficiencies not estimated for; but as he has been unfortunate in his figures heretofore, I prefer to follow my own.

I have endeavored carefully to prepare an estimate of the expenditures for the next fiscal year.

By the annual estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, the expenditures for that year would be $74,064,755. But this does not include many items, most of which will have to be paid for as certainly as the President's salary. Some are as follows:

Three new regiments.....	$4,289,547
Probable Post Office deficiencies, over amount appropriated.....	2,500,000
Public buildings.....	1,700,000
Private bills (estimated).....	1,000,000
Printing deficiency.....	600,000
Army deficiency, estimated to be same as last year.....	8,000,000
	18,089,547

Making in the aggregate, $92,143,202.

It is true that some of these may be overestimated, but I have taken the estimates furnished to me by the Committee of Ways and Means. It may be that the Army deficiencies next year may not be so large as I have put them down. It may be that two of these new regiments may be dispensed with. It may be that they will be much larger; but I take it as a reasonable inference that the deficiency next year will be as large as the deficiency this year, because deficiency bills never decrease.

Now, this sum of $92,000,000 does not include any of the following items of expenditure, and I wish gentlemen to add those, upon their own estimate, to this aggregate: For protecting works commenced on our numerous rivers and harbors, the lowest estimate of which is $1,500,000; and then there is your Calendar of one thousand private bills demanding your attention. There is the pension bill for the old soldiers of the war of 1812, proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SAVAGE,] requiring $8,000,000 per annum. There are the ten new war steamers, proposed by my friend from Virginia, [Mr. BOGOCCK,] $2,500,000. The French spoliation bill, urged so forcibly by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] which, if passed, will require $5,000,000. The duties to be refunded on goods destroyed by fire, I do not know how much. Commutation to the heirs of revolutionary soldiers, I do not know how much. Claims growing out of Indian wars in Oregon and Washington, urged by the Delegate from Oregon, and certified by an executive officer, $5,000,000. Then we have the Pacific railroad, a foretaste of the cost of which we have had in $1,000,000 expended already in the publication of the report of the surveys.

Now, I have shown that in all human probability the expenditures of this Government will be from ninety to one hundred million dollars. To meet this, the Secretary, in his recent letter, estimates the receipts for the first two quarters at $25,000,000. We know, from comparison with former years, that the receipts for the last two quarters will not exceed the first, making the aggregate of receipts $50,000,000, or a deficiency of over forty million dollars for next year.

And yet, sir, for this alarming condition of the public finances, the Administration has no measure of relief except loan bills, and paper money, in the form of Treasury notes. No provision is made for their payment; no measures of retrenchment and reform; but these accumulated difficulties are thrust upon the future, with the improvidence of a young spendthrift. While the Secretary is waiting to foresee contingencies, we are prevented by a party majority from instituting reform. If we indicate even the commencement of retrenchment, or point out abuses, on this side of the House, we are at once assailed by members of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The only effort at retrenchment which I have seen here successful, was that made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MASON,] in reducing the number of officers employed about this Hall.

That the Committee of Ways and Means have no purpose of commencing a reform, we have ample evidence in the appropriation bills before us. I have a table here showing that at the present session of Congress, its chairman has introduced appropriation bills, prior to the 12th of May, amounting to more than sixty-nine million dollars, as follows:

This table does not include permanent appropriations, amounting for this fiscal year to the sum of $7,436,582, nor does it include a multitude of bills appropriating money from all the other standing committees, and we are told that other bills are yet to be reported from the Ways and Means Committee. We know, by sure experience, that these appropriation bills are never diminished; they are increased in this House; they are sent to the Senate, and there they are overloaded with items already rejected by the House. Nor does this table include a class of expenditures much more deserving public favor than many of the bills reported. The rivers and harbors of the West in vain demand improvement. While millions are expended in your coast surveys and Atlantic defenses, you scruple over a comparatively small sum, absolutely necessary to keep from destruction improvements already commenced in the lake harbors.

If, while gentlemen are lavish in the public money, they would vote $1,500,000 to the protection of the commerce of the great and growing power in the Northwest, it would show some kind of justice and liberality. But, sir, the region of country which will in a short time control the destinies of this nation; which now, in its almost infancy, feeds your artisans and sailors, and in time of war furnishes sturdy defenders of your national honor, has appealed in vain for ordinary repairs of their harbors, because (for I can see no other reason) they are not upon the Atlantic coast. Time will soon cure this evil; and we who come from the West will have the power to legislate for ourselves, as the Atlantic and Gulf coast has done in times past.

I desire now to call the attention of the House to a comparison of expenditures of this year, and of this Administration, with past expenditures. I have a table, carefully prepared from official documents, (Ex. Docs. Nos. 13 and 60,) as follows:

A Table showing the expenses of the General Government, exclusive of the public debt, and the population shown by census, during each decennial year, and 1857.

Years.	Expenses.	Population.	Rate for an inhabitant.
*1789-90-91	$1,919,589 52	3,929,837	$ 48
1800	4,981,659 90	5,305,925	90
1810	5,311,082 28	7,239,914	73
1820	13,134,530 57	9,638,131	1 36
1830	13,329,533 33	12,856,020	1 03
1840	24,139,930 11	17,069,453	1 41
1850	37,165,000 00	23,191,676	1 63
1857	65,032,559 76	-	-
1858	$33,313,989 03	$28,000,000	2 98
1859	$93,000,000 00	-	-

It thus appears that from the foundation of our Government, on the 4th of March, 1789, to December 31, 1791, nearly three years, the aggregate expenses of this Government, exclusive of the public debt, were $1,919,589. For the next fiscal year probably a better basis for estimate—it was $1,877,903. Our population was then three million nine hundred and twenty-nine thousand, being less than fifty cents to each inhabitant. Our expenses have now increased to $83,000,000 this year, and $93,000,000 next year, making an average of three dollars to each inhabitant. In 1830, in General Jackson's time, the expenditures were $13,000,000, and the population was nearly as many millions. The amount to each inhabitant was $1 03. In 1840 it amounted to $1 40 to each inhabitant. But now it is $3 60 to each inhabitant, or $30 00 to every free family, upon the basis of the census of 1850 showing the number of families to be three million three hundred and sixty-two thousand three hundred and thirty-seven, or $23 00 to every voter of the four million fifty-four thousand four hundred and fifty at the presidential election of 1856. While the population has increased sevenfold, the expenditure has increased, up to 1857, thirty-six fold, and up to this year, forty-eight fold.

The aggregate expense of Mr. Pierce's administration, exclusive of payments on the public debt, was $232,820,632. The aggregate expense of the Government, from its foundation up to the close of the last war, and prior to January 1, 1815, exclusive of payments on the public debt, was $172,637,779; so that the expenses of the aimless, fruitless, mischievous, administration of President Pierce, were $69,000,000 more than the entire expenses of the Government up to the close of the last war. Sir, institute a comparison between the results of the first twenty-six years of our national Government, and of the late Administration. Contrast the history, progress, and growth of our country; contrast its purity, its prosperity, its greatness, during the administration of Jefferson, of Washington, of Madison, and of Adams, with that of Pierce, and then you may be able to appreciate the rapid growth of our expenditures from the simple fact that four years of modern Democratic administration cost more than twenty-six years in the earlier and purer days of the Republic. I have here the official table showing that fact:

The expenses of this year, the first under Mr. Buchanan's administration, will be $5,000,000 more than the entire expenses of the Government from its foundation to the close of Jefferson's administration. The aggregate expenses for the first twenty years of our Government were $78,363,762; and I have already shown that, this year, the expenses exceed $83,000,000.

Sir, your deficiency bill this year amounts to more than the average expenses of the Government for the first forty years of its existence. Your miscellaneous bill amounts to more than the aggregate expenses of the Government in any year, except the years of the war, prior to 1830. We appropriated $18,946,189 for miscellaneous purposes; and yet, if you look at the table you will find that the aggregate expenses of the General Government, exclusive of the public debt, are much less than that for every year except during the period of the last war with Great Britain.

I have another table here, carrying out the comparison instituted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CURRY] the other day, in his very able speech, to which I listened with great pleasure. It contrasts expenditures of the Government in 1840 and those of 1857:

A table showing details of expenditures of the General Government in the years 1840 and 1857, respectively, exclusive of public debt.

Expenditures, exclusive of public debt.....	$24,139,930 11	$65,032,559 76

By this it is shown, that, in the year 1840, the civil list amounted to $2,733,769 31, and in 1857 to $7,611,547 27. I find that the miscellaneous expenditures—an endless collection of jobs and contracts—run up from $2,500,000 to $19,000,000. I find that the expenditures for the military service run up from $7,000,000 in 1840, to $19,000,000 in 1857, and to $26,000,000 this year. The naval expenditures of the Government run up from $6,000,000 to over twelve million dollars, and for next year, over thirteen millions, exclusive of fortifications and the ten new sloops-of-war

* This includes expenditures from March 4, 1789, to December 30, 1791.

I have here another table showing the comparison of the expenditures for decimal periods:

Expenditures of the Government during the years 1790, 1800, 1810, 1820, 1830, 1840, 1850, 1857.

I find that I then omitted some items for the next year, and that the amount of emoluments is even larger than I stated. We have indirectly increased the salary and incidental expenses of the President from $29,000 to something like sixty thousand dollars, and that, too, in plain and direct violation of a clause of the Constitution which forbids any increase of the emoluments of the President during his term. Another comparison will illustrate the increase of expenditures. I find by reference to a speech made in the Senate, by Mr. Trueman Smith, (Congressional Globe, vol. 25, page 124,) that the entire expense of the printing for the Twenty-Sixth Congress was $190,864, or $95,432 per annum. I find, from a recent report from the chairman of the Committee on Printing, [Mr. TAYLOR,] that the expense for the printing for the Thirty-Third Congress—famous for its repeal of the Missouri compromise—amounted to $3,025,827, or $1,512,918 per annum; or more than ten thousand dollars to every member of both Houses of Congress. Such is the character of the increase in that single item alone. That was the expense incurred for the printing of the Thirty-Third Congress, which I think was the most disastrous in the history of our Government, because it reopened a strife long before that time settled, and inaugurated this wild system of reckless expenditure which we will find so difficult to check.

Look, sir, at the miscellaneous items of expenditures. In the early reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, the miscellaneous items were few and far between. But if gentlemen will turn to the reports for this session, (House Document No. 13,) they will find from page 25 to page 63 filled exclusively with the details of the miscellaneous expenses of the Government, amounting to $18,946,189. In this vast mausoleum are buried your secret contracts, your jobs, your custom-houses, your marine hospitals, your Post Office deficiency and post offices, your coast survey, your court-houses—a vast catalogue of jobs to partisan favorites.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. You voted for them. Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The gentleman will find, by looking at the record, he is mistaken. But I am glad that he has called my attention to this point. I hope he and his political friends will press it daily and hourly. His remark shows how thankless a task it is for gentlemen upon this side of the House to comply with the urgent demands of the Executive for money. Perhaps it may teach my friends a lesson; but if it does not, then I hope they will take warning from the example, and the very marked example, set the other day in the case of my late colleague, Mr. Campbell, who had displayed his zeal, I think unwisely, in the last Congress in urging all the appropriation bills, and complying to the fullest extent with the demands of the Executive; and, sir, when any of us yield, and, under the commendable desire to sustain the Government, even when unwisely administered, vote for general appropriation bills, then these extravagant appropriations are thrown in our teeth, when we only vote what they ask. I trust gentlemen upon this side of the House will take this as a warning and as a lesson. It is a thankless task for gentlemen to aid an Administration like this or its predecessor in carrying on the burdens of the Government, when they cannot vote for a single appropriation bill without having all these contingencies and jobs and other items thrust upon them, and being told, "you voted for them." Sir, I can say, for one, I did not. The gentleman will not find me in that category.

I have already referred to the military establishment showing a vast increase in its expenditures. I might, with the documents before me, show how millions have been sunk for transportation, subsistence, and supplies, upon contracts made without public notice, but I am admonished that my time will not allow.

Without an opportunity to examine, and under the plea of pressing necessity, at an early period of the session, we were called upon to vote extravagant appropriations, intended to cover large contracts for subsistence and transportation—many of which are illegal—or have it charged upon us that we were willing to leave our gallant army in the Rocky Mountains without food and shelter. Unwilling to do that, some on this side voted for the deficiency bill; but who can trace the expenditure of this money?

We were told yesterday by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that all these appropriations are in pursuance of existing law. Now, I want him to answer at his leisure, how it comes that in 1852 there were employed in the collecting of the revenue two thousand five hundred and thirty persons; and that in 1854, when the law had not been changed, there were employed in the various custom-houses two thousand nine hundred and thirteen; and in 1857, three thousand and eighty-eight employees; and this before the new tariff had gone into operation? How comes this increase of five hundred officers in the custom-houses? Under what law was the increase made? By what authority are these fresh leeches set upon the Treasury? Sir, a large portion of the appropriations annually made depend simply upon your will; and if you cut off the supply, the expenditures will cease without impairing a single provision of law.

Sir, retrenchment and reform are now matters of imperative necessity. It is not the mere cry of demagogues, but a problem demanding the attention and worthy the highest ability of the Representatives of the people. No party is fit to govern this country which cannot solve it. It is in vain to look to executive officers for reform. Their power and influence depend upon executive patronage, and while we grant they will squander. The Senate is neither by the theory of our system, nor by its composition, fitted for the task. This House alone has the constitutional power to perfect a radical reform. The Constitution provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. These provisions were designed to invest in this House the entire control over the public purse—the power of supply; this is invested in the House of Commons, and has been jealously guarded by it. It is the pearl beyond price, without which constitutional liberty in England would long since have fallen under the despotism of the Crown.

By the exercise of this power we may hold the Executive and the Senate in check. But instead of using it, this House has, by slow degrees, allowed the other departments of the Government to evade and virtually overthrow its constitutional power. This change may be briefly illustrated. The theory of our Government is that a specific sum shall be appropriated by a law originating in this House, for a specific purpose, and within a given fiscal year. It is the duty of the Executive to use that sum, and no more, expressly for that purpose and no other, and within the time fixed. Such is the theory; but what is the practice? Under a section of a law passed in August, 1842, which was designed only for that bill and for that year, the Departments assume the power to transfer appropriations made for one purpose, to any other purpose in the same Department, thus defeating all checks. Without law they use money appropriated specifically for the service of one fiscal year, to pay for the service of another fiscal year. A marked example of this occurred recently. The present Secretary of the Treasury took money appropriated in March, 1855, for the expenses of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas for the year ending June 30, 1856, and in the face of a refusal by Congress to appropriate money to support the bogus usurping Legislative Assembly for the year ending June 30, 1857, took the balance of the old appropriation and applied it to that purpose.

Another abuse by the Executive Departments, is, in their habit of making contracts in advance of appropriations. They make contracts without law, and compel us either to sanction them or

It shows a gradual increase of the expenditures of the Government, until within a few years, and then a rapid increase for the last few years, as compared with former ratios of increase. Formerly, and prior to 1840, the expenditures of the Government increased in but a slight degree more than the ratio of population and the extension of Territory; but now it is going far beyond that.

Now, when we go into the details of this expenditure, we find some of the most startling phases of political economy. Let us take up, for instance, the item of contingent expenses of the House and Senate. In 1840 the pay for the employees of both Houses of Congress amounted to $42,592; in 1857, it amounted to $156,000; and yet the number of persons composing the Congress of 1840 and 1857 was substantially the same. I find that the incidental and contingent expenses of the Senate rose from $100,000 to $287,000; the incidental expenses of the House from $240,000 to $1,340,000. I find that the expenses of the President and the different Departments, at the other end of the avenue, have risen from $850,581 to $1,927,673. I have before me a statement which I had the temerity—for so the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means regarded it—to read the other day. It is a table showing appropriations for the President, and for his house, garden, and grounds, in 1840 and 1859:

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, MAY 28, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 153.

violate the public faith. I will give a common instance. An appropriation of $100,000 is made to construct a custom-house; the Department, instead of contracting for a custom-house of that cost, make contracts for the construction of one costing two or three millions. In this way, the power of the House has been absolutely overruled. And when they come here and ask for money to carry on the work, you vote the money, to save from entire loss the sum already expended and because the contracts have been made. Now, sir, I say that every contract which looks to the expenditure of one dollar more than has been appropriated, is utterly null and void. Take, for instance, the custom-house at New Orleans. In 1848, Congress appropriated $100,000 for the construction of a custom-house in that city, upon the express condition that the city should donate to the Government a lot of ground for that purpose, and make out a clear and valid title. Well, sir, the $100,000 appropriated was all expended in the sinking of the foundation of a building of untold magnificence, never contemplated by those who made the appropriation. The Department again came to Congress for another appropriation, and Congress has gone on making appropriations until $2,675,258 have been expended; and the Representative from New Orleans is now demanding more money to complete her custom-house.

For the city of Charleston, South Carolina, in 1848, an appropriation of $30,000 was made as a sort of a rider to an appropriation for a custom-house at Savannah. Well, sir, upon the basis of that $30,000 the Government has gone on with its plans, and has already expended $1,703,000. I do not know how much more will be needed to complete the building; but the Representative from the Charleston district told us the other day that valuable ornaments of stone were laying about, and further appropriations were needed either to complete the building or protect the materials from destruction. In this way the Executive is gradually sapping the foundations of the Government and destroying the constitutional power of the House. Instead of a representative Republic, we are degenerating into a bureaucracy governed by red tape and subaltern clerks. While the powers of the House are invaded, the Executive takes care to extend, by construction, his just powers. Of this we have an example in the Utah war. What power has the President, without the consent of Congress, to order the Army to Utah, and thus involve the Government in an expenditure of millions upon millions? It is said that he is Commander-in-Chief of the Army, under the Constitution of the United States. But the Constitution declares that Congress shall declare war. He is Commander-in-Chief, but only to carry on war when war has been declared by the Congress of the United States. He is our instrument, he is our servant, and not our master. And yet he has involved the Government in this Utah war. It is a usurpation which ought to be resisted by the whole legislative power of the Government.

We have the undoubted power over supplies, and yet the President so acts as to leave us no discretion. He creates the necessity for expenditures; and when we are asked to appropriate money to pay them, all the reply we have to our inquiries is, that the Army was ordered there by the President, as the Commander-in-Chief of the forces. While I would not allow these gallant men to suffer where they are, yet I would call the President to account for having violated the principle and policy of our Government.

The Senate, also, has been guilty of an invasion of our privileges. When we send bills there they are returned to us loaded down with amendments for the very sums which we refused to give. They send these amendments here and we are implicitly told that unless we agree to them the entire appropriation bill will fail, and Congress be called back in extra session. It will be recollected that the appropriation for the Washington aqueduct, and many other extravagant items of expenditure, were carried through in that way.

The Constitution of the United States gives to the Senate power to propose amendments to revenue bills, but expressly withholds from it power to originate such bills. But by the abuse of their limited power to amend, they defeat the exclusive power of the House. But not only that, the Senate at this session, by direct usurpation, has exercised the power which the Constitution confers upon this House alone. It has originated a loan bill, sent it here, and it is now upon the Speaker's table. Is not a loan bill a bill for raising revenue? There was some dispute as to appropriation bills being revenue bills, but there can be no doubt about this bill. If a loan bill is not a revenue bill, I do not know what is. Blackstone defines a revenue bill to include all bills by which money is directed to be raised upon the subject, for any purpose, or in any shape whatsoever. (Com., vol. 1, page 169.) This bill proposes to raise revenue by borrowing. If you look at the practice of the House of Commons you will see that loan bills are in the first class of revenue bills.

Sir, as the Senate has sent this revenue bill here in violation of the Constitution, the House ought not to receive it. There is an example in British history, where such a bill was sent by the House of Lords to the House of Commons. It occurred two hundred and fifty years ago. The House of Commons sent the bill back to the House of Lords with a message that the House of Commons could not even consider the bill, because it violated their privileges. From that day to this, the House of Commons would never allow the House of Lords to originate any money bills. It was from that feature in the British Constitution that our fathers modeled the provision inserted in the Constitution of the United States; and the only difference between our law and the law of England is, that the Senate may amend revenue bills, but cannot originate them. The House of Lords cannot amend them, nor add even an appropriation for one dollar to any bill for any purpose; because it is the privilege of the House of Commons to raise money bills. To show the importance attached to this power, I ask attention to high authorities:

"It is the ancient, indisputable privilege and right of the House of Commons, that all grants of subsidies of Parliament aids do begin in this House, and are first bestowed by them."—Blackstone's Com., vol. 1, page 163.

"The general reason given for this exclusive privilege of the House of Commons is, that the supplies are raised upon the body of the people, and therefore it is proper that they alone should have the right of taxing themselves."—Same, vol. 1, page 168.

"It would, therefore, be extremely dangerous to give the Lords any power of framing new taxes for the subject; it is sufficient that they have a power of rejecting, if they think the Commons too lavish or improvident in their grants."—Same, vol. 1, page 168.

"The Commons are not only treasurers to the nation, but also possess the initiative of any bill imposing a tax, for whatever purpose."—Ferrall's Law of Parl., page 103.

"So tenacious have the Commons been of this money privilege, that they have frequently rejected bills containing money clauses, solely on the ground of their not having originated with themselves."—Ferrall, page 103.

"On 3d July, 1678, it was resolved, 'That all aids and supplies, and aids to his Majesty in Parliament, are the sole gift of the Commons; and all bills for the granting of any such aids and supplies ought to begin with the Commons; and it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct, limit, and appoint, in such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants, which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords.'"—Ferrall, page 103.

"The Commons have so uniformly and so vigorously resisted every attempt of the Lords to interfere with this right, that the latter have long since desisted from either originating money bills, or from making amendments to such bills passed by the Commons. The period in which the greater number of precedents occur begins from the restoration and continues down to the beginning of the last century; and whenever the question has arisen, the prompt and zealous denial of the Commons has crushed the encroachment so effectually, that latterly the Lords have abandoned all further attempts as hopeless. This privilege is now the sole and undisputed right of the Commons."—Ferrall, page 107.

As the Senate has sent us this bill, let us follow the example of the House of Commons, which I have recited, and send it back with the message that we cannot even consider it, because it violates the privileges of the House of Representatives. A single evidence of the spirit and watchfulness of our fathers would save us from further encroachment. But we are told that the Senate has sent loan bills to this House before. Well, if there have been bad precedents, I see no reason why we should continue to follow them. Instead of reference to the Constitution, we are referred to bad precedents. We may be referred to the Treasury loan bill, at the beginning of this session, which came to us from the Senate. I say that even a multitude of bad precedents do not repeal the Constitution of the United States. If so, then there is no safeguard, no virtue, in the Constitution. It is the unalterable law of the people, and neither precedents nor Presidents nor Senators dare overthrow it so long as there is an independent House of Representatives to hold them in check.

But many of these abuses have grown out of the neglect of the House. We have thrown too much of the business of the House upon the Committee of Ways and Means. Voluminous reports from the Executive Departments are sent, without indexes, to that committee. It is not in the power of that committee to give the proper inquiry and consideration to all this business, and, therefore, they become the mere transcribing clerks of the Executive Departments. When any information is asked for in debate, no member is able to give it; but the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means sends to the Clerk's desk, to be read, a letter from some subordinate under the President. This is not right. Every committee should be allowed to originate its own appropriation bill. There is no reason why the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. QUITMAN] should not have the preparation of the Army appropriation bill, instead of the Committee of Ways and Means. The Committee on Naval Affairs consists of gentlemen well acquainted with the details of that service, and there is not one soldier, much less a general, on the Committee of Ways and Means.

There is no reason why the Committee on Naval Affairs, over which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOCK] presides, should not frame the Navy appropriation bill. The Committee of Ways and Means was originally intended as the committee to which should be referred measures of revenue and tariff. Instead of being confined to that, they have had transferred to them the whole legislation of the country; and when that committee is composed, as it is at this session, of a strong party cast, and the Administration can command a majority on it, we virtually deprive ourselves of all power to decide on questions of legislation, and intrust them all to that committee. From the large mass of business thrown upon that committee, it is compelled either to neglect a portion or to report to the House without that ample information which we ought to have on every question of finance.

Another neglect or abuse is in the mode in which we conduct our business. The practical limitation of debate is a surrender of our privilege. Every grievance should be redressed before an appropriation is made. The old maxim was, "grievances before subsidies." It was under that good old maxim of the British law that our forefathers held in check the Crown of Great Britain. It was under the same principle that our forefathers entered into the revolutionary struggle. We ought to stand by it; but instead of that, we come here and debate at length Executive usurpation, and then, at the end of the session, rush the appropriation bills through, giving the Executive all he wants, and ample means and power to laugh us to scorn. An Opposition that does not perform its full duty, that does not withhold appropriations until the Executive yields to the just demands of the people, is not true to itself or its constituents.

Again, we appropriate money, and never inquire into its expenditure. The 89th rule provides for a Committee on Expenditures; yet that committee never meets. It is a remarkable thing that that committee, which ought to be one of the most important of the House, is totally neglected.

In the reference of the President's message, the Committee on Expenditures is never mentioned; yet it ought to have before it all the expenses of the Government, and every dollar expended by the Government should undergo before it a careful scrutiny. By reference to the rule, it will be seen that that committee is bound to examine every item of expenditure, and to see that it is made in conformity with law. Yet it has not met for years. So, too, with other committees. Shortly after the late war with Great Britain, five or six standing committees were created to examine the expenditures in the various Executive Departments. These committees are annually appointed, but rather for show than service. Nothing is referred to them. It is not their fault, but the neglect of the House. Here is a reform which ought at once to be made. All these committees on expenditures ought to be charged by the House with the proper documents, and should faithfully perform their very important duties.

And, sir, we have neglected another power, and that is the power of impeachment. Every violation of a provision of law ought to be followed, either by impeachment or a bill of indemnity. If the necessity is so urgent as to justify an executive officer in violating a law, or to vary a hair's breadth from the law, this House ought to recognize that necessity by passing a bill of indemnity; otherwise an impeachment ought to follow the moment the delinquency is brought to the notice of Congress. In my judgment, the House ought not to waste its time in covering up plain violations of law, even if not involving turpitude, violations which ought to be followed by impeachment, and thus throw upon the Senate the duty of trying the offender.

When you bring about these reforms, we shall have no more loan bills, we shall have no more Treasury notes. In my judgment, from the most careful examination I can make, the expenditures for the next fiscal year can be reduced to $50,000,000, a sum which will be within the public receipts. But I have no hope that this will be done. We know by fatal experience the power and influence of the Executive uncurbed and unchecked. It is only when this House assumes and maintains its full powers, and enforces them, that the President and the heads of the Departments can be kept within the law. I include heads of Departments, because, though not recognized by the Constitution, except as mere clerks of the Executive, yet custom and public opinion have given their mandates an undue importance. They are sent to us, the Representatives of a free people, and we are expected to bow in abject submission to their demands. For one, while I hold a seat upon this floor, I will examine for and expose any violation of law, whoever may commit it. Such is the duty of each of us. Important powers are delegated to us, and we cannot avoid their exercise without dishonor. When a mere question of personal etiquette arises, we may be disposed to bow politely and yield; but when it comes to performing representative duties, we should perform them, whoever may sneer, whoever may reproach, and whatever power may stand in the way. I know no power above the power of this House.

But, sir, I have no hope, while this House is constituted as it is now, of instituting any radical reform. I believe that the House of Representatives should be in opposition to the President. We know the intimate relations made by party ties and party feelings. We know that with a party House, a House a majority of whose members are friends of the President, it is impossible to bring about a reform. It is only by a firm, able, and determined opposition—not yielding to every friendly request, not yielding to every urgent demand, not yielding to every appeal—that we can expect to reform the abuses in the administration of the Government.

At the beginning of this session I did hope that a majority of this House would compose such an opposition; and while on the one hand it crushed the unholy attempt to impose an odious constitution—by force, or with threats or bribes—upon a free people, it would be prepared to check the reckless extravagance of the Administration in the disbursement of the public funds. But the power of party ties and Executive influence were too potent. We can only look now to the virtue and intelligence of the people, whose potent will can overthrow Presidents, Senates, and majorities. I have an abiding hope that the next House of Representatives will do what this should have done, and become, like its great prototype, the guardian of the rights and liberties of the people.

I return my sincere thanks to the committee for the indulgence and attention it has given me.

Mr. LETCHER. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the question of the public expenditures has begun to attract some degree of attention in this House; and the only cause of regret I have now in connection with the matter is, that my friend from Ohio had not sooner waked up to the importance of the matter, at least as early as last Congress, and invited the attention of his friends to an investigation, which he now seems to think is so much demanded. At that time there was an opportunity to do something practicable; because political parties in this House were then nearly balanced, and they had, at least, as much power as we had, and they could have introduced such measures and pressed them to adoption, and thus brought about important and valuable results. But, sir, no matter when a question of this sort comes up, I am always gratified to hear it; and I trust, although it is too late to operate upon the expenditures already passed, it will be in time to exert a salutary influence upon bills yet to be acted upon by the House. Sir, there are many bills yet behind; there are various river and harbor bills yet to be brought up for the consideration of this House, and they are now being launched in the other end of this Capitol, preparatory to their introduction here, which will involve large appropriations of the public money. If those bills shall become laws, it will be necessary that the money shall be raised to meet the expenditure which will be required by them. I trust that when that time comes we may expect to find my friend from Ohio upon our side, resisting a loan to furnish the money which will be required to make these river and harbor improvements, for which some of our friends on both sides of the House are now so clamorous.

If I remember aright the history of past Congresses, a proposition was started which proposed to establish an ocean telegraph line between this and a foreign country; and it placed under the control of that company two vessels of the United States, manned, armed, and equipped, to be supported and furnished for that service by the Government, and to be employed in aiding that private company in laying down their telegraph line for their own profit and emolument. And, if I mistake not, our friends upon the other side of the House were in favor of a measure which proposed to construct a telegraph outside of the limits of the United States. Now, my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who has preferred the charge of extravagance, (if my recollection is not very greatly at fault,) defended the measure and voted for it.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I did vote for it.

Mr. LETCHER. Now, was that a measure recommended by anybody at the other end of the avenue? Were the Departments of this Government called upon to consider it? Was the President of the United States asked for his opinion in regard to it? Did he send any recommendation to that Congress asking that they should appropriate money, or that they should withdraw those national vessels from their legitimate service and put them under the control of a private company? Nothing of that sort. Then, if it originated here, with what propriety can the late President of the United States and the late Administration be arraigned for encouraging a profligate expenditure of the public money?

Mr. STANTON. How much money was appropriated?

Mr. LETCHER. I do not know the amount, but it required vessels to be taken, the vessels to be manned and commanded as if in the regular service, to be furnished and supported; and even now there is a complaint made against the present Secretary of the Navy, that he has withheld one vessel which was assigned to that service under the private company, engaged in the construction of this line.

Then, sir, there was another measure which had its origin at the last session of Congress, for an increase of the pay of the Army of the United States. How did my friend from Ohio vote on that subject? Did he vote for the increase or against it?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The record will show. I will say to the gentleman frankly, that I do not recollect.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, I do not know, but I think I would agree to venture something right handsome that he voted for that increase. This, then, was another way in which the expenditures were increased.

Then, sir, we had another proposition to commission the chief officer of the Army of the United States as Lieutenant General, and thereby to give him greatly increased compensation. How did my friend from Ohio vote upon that? Was it not "ay?"

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I think I was not here at the time, but if I had been, I would have voted "ay." I would confer that benefit on General Scott or any other officer who had performed similar services.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not complain of my friend's vote. All that I complain of him for is that he should undertake to have other people executed for offenses he has been committing himself.

Then, we had another bill here to increase the efficiency of the Navy. I think the gentleman from Ohio voted for that, and he will recollect that it was only yesterday that we had to appropriate $110,000 to cover the expenses of courts-martial growing out of that plan for making the Navy efficient.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will press this class of arguments upon this side of the House, because they are required on this side of the House as well as upon the other side.

I hope he will press it distinctly and often upon this side of the House, that they have not done their duty, and urge them to do it in future.

Mr. LETCHER. My business at present is with my friend from Ohio. I take the chief sinner first. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I will answer the gentleman's question. I was not a member of the Thirty-Third Congress, which I believe, passed the bill to promote the efficiency of the Navy.

Mr. LETCHER. I think it was passed during the last Congress.

Several MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, then, we had another bill that passed the last Congress to give them all these courts-martial.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I cannot say what my vote on that bill was, but the gentleman's colleague [Mr. BOGGS] will convince him that I have been opposed to all this humbug about the suspended officers of the Navy. I think they were served exactly right.

Mr. LETCHER. I will do my friend from Ohio no injustice. I will say this, (to his credit,) that he has been much more considerate in the expenditure of money than most members of this House. And while I am gratified that such is the fact, I think that I have some right to complain of him for arraigning others for expenditures that he voted for himself.

Now, sir, the President of the United States, in the last Congress, undertook to check the expenditure of the public money for rivers and harbors. It will be recollected by those of us who were here, and those who have read the history of the times, that the President of the United States sent in a veto upon those river and harbor bills. My friend from Ohio, sir, took issue with him. He was for expending that money. He was for overruling the Executive veto, and he was for adding those sums to the expenditures of that Congress.

Mr. STANTON. I think the gentleman is mistaken about the time when the river and harbor bills were vetoed. I think it was in the Thirty-Third Congress.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. LETCHER. I believe it was in the last Congress, but I do not care what Congress it was in. The gentleman and his friends were for overruling the President. I well recollect that when the veto came in, a gentleman from Ohio rose in his place and announced that "a revolution had commenced," but that that revolution was bloodless as yet, and he appealed to his friends to overrule the presidential veto.

But, as I understand it, my friend from Ohio insists now that appropriations for river and harbor improvements shall be made at the present session of Congress; and undertakes to say, in addition, that if they are not made now, the time is coming when power will be concentrated in the Northwest, and when that power will be wielded to coerce this species of legislation for that section of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I said that the time will come when the Northwest will be able to demand of the General Government a fair share of the disbursements of the Government for such purposes as the coast survey and the like of that, and that the same constitutional power which will authorize the gentleman to report to us a bill providing for the coast survey and all that class of expenditures, will also authorize the expenditure of public money on the lakes.

Mr. LETCHER. Why, Mr. Chairman, if equality is all that the Northwest desires, look at the donations of public lands for one purpose or another that have been made for those States, and the value of those donations for railroad purposes, for water-line communications, education, and other purposes, and you will find that when a balance comes to be struck, whatever may have been given to the South falls very far short of what has been given to the Northwest, out of this great land fund that is the common property of all the States of the Union.

Why, sir, it was only during the last Congress that millions upon millions of acres of the public lands were given to those States for railroad purposes, and they have been applied for those purposes. Large donations were made for school purposes, for universities, and for various public buildings within the Territories located in that section of the country, while my own section is deprived of any participation whatsoever in those donations thus given to the northwestern States and Territories. But, sir, more than that; we have had various other propositions which I shall not now undertake to particularize, because I have been brought into this debate to reply suddenly, upon the spur of the moment, to a very able speech, carefully prepared by my friend from Ohio, arraigning the Administration upon point after point; and I must, therefore, only now reply to such points as shall suggest themselves to me, reserving to myself the right, if an opportunity shall occur between now and the end of the session, to discuss this question of Government expenditures pretty fully.

Now, sir, my friend from Ohio complains that the Administration has undertaken to involve us in a controversy with Utah, and that it has required large expenditures of public money to sustain the Army, and to make it effective for the service in which it was employed in that connection. I had supposed that the gentleman from Ohio, himself, was in favor of having something done in the Territory of Utah; because, if I recollect aright, this very question was made part and parcel of his platform in the last presidential canvass.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I will say, that upon this side of the House we are all opposed to the "twin relics." [Laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. Then why arraign the Administration for endeavoring to bring the people to subjection to the law, which you say ought to be respected?

Mr. GROW. You have not got any law.

Mr. LETCHER. Then why, when these people are in open rebellion against the law, and when the President finds it necessary to execute it by calling the military power to his aid, do you arraign him, and say that he ought to be impeached for an exercise of power not warranted? I give it as my opinion that he has done nothing more than was his duty in that connection, and for doing that duty, instead of receiving the censure and condemnation of this House, he deserves to be applauded here, and applauded throughout the country.

Mr. STANTON. If the gentleman wants the information, I will give it to him.

Mr. LETCHER. Very well; I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BISHOP. I object to these interruptions.

Mr. STANTON. The course proposed by this side of the House, is to settle this matter by congressional legislation. We propose to regulate this matter by law in the first place, and then execute the law. The difficulty this side of the House has found, is that the people of Utah have violated no law which we can go to war about.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I have only to say to my friends on the other side of the House, that it seems to me they are very slow in bringing forward their legislation. Why have they not brought forward some proposition long ago to remove the difficulty?

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,]—

Mr. LETCHER. What is that?

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman from Virginia inquires why we do not introduce some legislation on this side of the Hall? I will state that, at the last Congress, a bill was introduced by me to prohibit polygamy, which was referred and reported back to the House, but it was never reached. In the present session, at the earliest moment I could, I introduced a bill upon the same subject, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, but has not been reported back to the House. A majority of that committee is composed of gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. LETCHER. You had your committees in the last Congress, and you had your Speaker: why did you not then get up your bill and pass it? But I ask the gentleman from Ohio what authority you have got to pass any laws to remedy the difficulty? Will you pass a law to interfere with the religion of the Mormons, as they consider it? How will you frame your laws to meet this difficulty, and where will you get your authority?

Mr. STANTON. We on this side of the House hold that Congress has not yielded all the power to legislate over the Territories; they have as much power to legislate upon the subject of polygamy or any other crime as they have in the District of Columbia, or as the States have within their own jurisdiction.

Mr. LETCHER. The right to legislate for the overthrow of their religion?

Mr. STANTON. We have as much right to legislate there within the limits of the Constitution as any State has within its own limits.

Mr. LETCHER. Does the gentleman take the grounds then that we have the right to legislate upon the subject of religion?

Mr. STANTON. I take the ground that we have the right to prohibit polygamy. Does the gentleman call that religion?

Mr. LETCHER. I say that they call it religion; and if the gentleman undertakes to decide whether it is good or bad religion, somebody else may decide that his religion is bad; and they have just as much right so to decide as he has to decide that the religion of anybody else is bad.

Mr. STANTON. Will the gentleman undertake to say that when they call religion has reference to the social relation, and to the relation between the sexes, it is not within the control of the legislation of Congress? Cannot a State prescribe regulations in respect to marriage, and prohibit polygamy? Have you not such laws in this District? and, if so, why cannot you make such laws for the Territory?

Mr. LETCHER. You have delegated to the Territory of Utah the right to legislate in regard to her domestic institutions. Now, where have you reserved the right to legislate upon this subject?

Mr. STANTON. We have certainly not delegated all legislative powers.

Mr. LETCHER. Where have you reserved the power you are now claiming to exercise upon this subject?

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman from Virginia will yield to me for a moment, I will answer his question. In the organic act of Utah Territory, Congress expressly reserved the power to approve or disapprove of all laws passed by its Legislative Assembly.

Mr. LETCHER. But, suppose they have passed no law upon the subject—as I understand they have not done—how is Congress to approve or disapprove them? I think they have passed no law recognizing polygamy; or, if they have, I have been unable to find it in their statutes.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman will examine the laws passed by the territorial government of Utah, he will find that the whole subject is placed in the power of the priesthood, and that by legislation they indirectly, but still substantially, recognize polygamy.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, sir, I doubt very much whether the gentleman can find that. It is certainly not in the volume I saw. I have seen but one volume of their acts, which was some two or three years ago, when I had occasion to use it in debate; but I was unable to find any such law there.

Now, sir, there is another point. My friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] undertook to charge here that the Administration were constantly violating the law when they allowed a surplus to be carried from one head of an appropriation and applied to another. Well, now, sir, if the gentleman will turn to the tenth volume of the Statutes at Large, he will find this section, which I commend to his consideration and to the consideration of gentlemen on the other side of the House, and I think a good portion of them will be willing to indorse it when they learn from whose pen it emanated. The section is in these words:

"SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That in case the sum appropriated for any object should be found more than sufficient to meet the expense thereby contemplated, the surplus may be applied, under the direction of the head of the proper Department, to supply the deficiency of any other item in the same Department or office: Provided, That the expenditure for newspapers and periodicals shall not exceed the amount specifically appropriated to that object by this act."

Now, sir, I think gentlemen on the other side of the House, who have supported Mr. Fillmore's administration, will recognize this as pretty good authority for the transfer of which they complain, for it was drawn by the pen of Mr. Fillmore himself when he occupied the position of chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of this House. It has remained on the statute-book from that day to this. Now, sir, those gentlemen on the other side of the House who have associated with him in politics, and who stand now in opposition to the Administration, and who are now complaining of the action of the late and present Secretaries of the Treasury, may rest satisfied that those officers have acted strictly up to the letter of the law, drawn by a late Whig President of the United States.

Mr. STANTON. Did that law authorize the appropriation, in 1857, for the expenses of the Kansas Legislature, of another item designed for another purpose?

Mr. LETCHER. Well, sir, I do not know that it does exactly. I wish to deal fairly with the gentleman about it. Now, as one good turn deserves another, does it not justify every other transfer made by Howell Cobb or James Guthrie?

Mr. STANTON. Indeed I do not know, as I have not examined it.

Mr. LETCHER. It seems to me that my friend ought to be examining into the facts, and ought not to confine his sight to this little isolated expenditure for the Legislature of Kansas. That is but a meat floating upon the surface. There are other large expenditures. I can remind him of one which occurs to me now, (and it is the only one that does,) where an appropriation made for one purpose was transferred for the purpose of keeping up the armories of the United States, the appropriation for which was omitted by mistake in enrolling the bill. Let me say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that he had a chance to raise this question when the bill to restore the appropriation for the armories was introduced during this session by my colleague of the Harper's Ferry district, [Mr. FAULKNER.] I believe that bill passed with general concurrence, or with such general concurrence that even the yeas and nays were not called on it.

Mr. STANTON. They were called.

Mr. LETCHER. What was the vote?

Mr. STANTON. I know that I made a speech against it; and I know that I voted against it.

Mr. LETCHER. I know that my friend was in a lean minority of the Committee on Military Affairs on that bill. I do not think that he then carried his party with him; and certainly, if there is any man in this House who can carry his party followers, by the force of his intellect, he is the man. No man deservedly wields more power with his party in this House than he does. If he could not save his own nousehold on that occasion, if they indorsed this policy of the Administration in defiance of his wishes and advice, how is it that he undertakes here, months afterwards, to arraign the Administration for a policy which his friends indorsed?

But my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] undertakes to arraign the Committee of Ways and Means on the same ground that has been taken ever since this session opened. He says that we are in the habit of reporting bills in conformity with the estimates which come down to us from the other end of the avenue; that we do not look into these estimates, that we do not inquire about them, that we are willing to take their say so and conform our action to it, and report accordingly to this House.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I do not want my friend from Virginia to misinterpret what I said. I said, from the burden of business thrown upon them by the House, that they could not properly attend to it. I think that the Committee of Ways and Means are always willing to perform their duty.

Mr. LETCHER. Then the result is exactly this: we have not done our duty. It comes down to that point—that we have not done our duty; because, he says, we have not had time. I take it that my friend from Ohio can lay his finger upon some one recommendation from the Committee of Ways and Means which is not warranted by the law. What one does he name?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. My remark was not that they reported what is not warranted by law; that was not it; but that they did not cut down the appropriations. The appropriations are at the pleasure of the House, and they may be cut down at any time. We may reduce, by a single stroke of the pen, the expenses of this Government $20,000,000, if we choose. The appropriations can be cut down in various ways. I could suggest to the gentleman many places where there might be a reduction. If it is the pleasure of the committee, I have no doubt that, by lopping off a number of contingencies and miscellaneous items, we might reduce the appropriations for the Government nearly ten million dollars. I had prepared a table of contingencies which I can furnish the gentleman with.

Mr. LETCHER. Let us see what we have done when we have undertaken to make recommendations. My friend will admit that, where the law fixes the amount, we are bound to conform to that amount in the bill. That, I take it, he will assent to. I refer to salaries and such matters, where a definite amount is fixed by law.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The committee has reported a bill appropriating $4,000,000 for collecting the revenue. I have shown that here it has increased the number of officers over five hundred. If the committee has the power to increase, it has the power to decrease. One implies the other. Why, then, did it not appropriate $3,000,000 or $2,000,000, instead of $4,000,000? And why were not specific items given to us, so that we might be able to tell which of those amounts ought to be appropriated? Why, in this season of want, when loan bills are the order of the day, ask the House to appropriate more than was ever before appropriated for this object? Is it because the committee has not time to sift the matter as it should be sifted, and as it would have been if it had been sent to some other committee having charge of this distinct matter? I believe, for instance, that if this Army appropriation bill had been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which is composed of gentlemen familiar with the details of the Army, that they could have cut it down, when the Committee of Ways and Means, who are civilians, and not soldiers, would not know whether the appropriations were absolutely necessary or not.

Mr. LETCHER. If the bill was improperly referred, whose fault was that?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I do not blame the committee.

Mr. LETCHER. Do not the rules of the House require that it should go there, and did it not go there in obedience to those rules?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I do not blame the Committee of Ways and Means. I make that disclaimer again. I said that it was one of the neglects of this House in failing to make the rules so that the business would be divided properly amongst the appropriate committees.

Mr. LETCHER. That is another question altogether. My friend has been arraigning, not the House, but the President for executive dictation; for controlling his men in this body, and bringing them up to the scratch in behalf of appropriation bills.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I must be allowed to say in this connection that I did not mention the Committee of Ways and Means, except in so far as the remark went, that the House has neglected its duty in not referring its business to the several appropriate committees.

Mr. LETCHER. Very well; if the thing devolves upon the House of Representatives, let the evil be corrected by the House; but do not make it the subject of complaint against the Administration.

But my friend has a good deal to say about executive dictation. I do not know who is under the influence of that dictation here. I do not know what the Executive has undertaken to do to control the party. But I can give him an incident in the history of a party in this country in regard to executive dictation, that is without a parallel, so far as I know, in the history of another party in this land. There was a time, some sixteen or seventeen years ago, when the party with which I never have been connected was in power, and had control of both branches of Congress. Mr. Tyler was President of the United States. After he had vetoed one or two bank bills, the party in both branches met in caucus, and appointed a committee to wait upon him and pledge themselves that, if he would furnish his views in the shape of a bill, they would pass the bill so approved, without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." It was done, and they claimed that John Tyler had betrayed them, because he would not sign the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. At the time of that enormous delinquency, President Tyler did not belong to any party, and, so far as I am concerned, I might plead that he was in the minority on that occasion. He belonged to no party but his own, and that was a very small banding.

Mr. LETCHER. Well then, Mr. Chairman, it was so much the worse, that a great party at that day, who had control of both branches of Congress should have been willing to place themselves under the control of a gentleman, who, they now say, had not power enough to muster a party. There would have been some excuse for the other side if he had been their own party leader, and there had been some difference of opinion which they wished to harmonize and reconcile. When my friend from Ohio can find such an instance as that in the history of the Democratic party, where they have gone to the President of the United States with a bill in hand, and asked him to place it in such a form as would meet his favor and approval, and then pledge themselves to pass it, and have come back and passed it in that shape, he may, with propriety, arraign us for bowing at the footstool of power to learn the executive will; but until it can be found, let them at least take care of their own household and not arraign others. It is proper to say that Mr. Tyler denied that he had agreed to approve the bill that was passed.

And now, let me come a little further down in the occurrences of this session, when the great party upon the other side of the House surrendered to a small party upon this side of the House upon the Kansas question. Sir, as I understand it, that great party did not claim, that, in voting for the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment, they were carrying out their own principles upon that subject; but that they made a surrender for the purpose of securing harmony, and preferred that bill in order that they might command the power to overthrow the Democratic party.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, that so far as I know, the Republican members voted for the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment as the only and shortest way of defeating an attempt, which was being made by the Administration, to force upon the people of Kansas a constitution which was rejected by them.

Mr. LETCHER. Then it comes exactly to the point I have maintained. My friend from Ohio pleads here, not that the bill contained his principles or favored his views, but that it was necessary to make up a power sufficient to crush the Administration, that induced them to sustain it. Does not that leave the question exactly where I placed it? If, then, gentlemen upon the other side of the House vote from considerations like those, for the purpose of crushing the Democratic party, I submit to them that it is at least worthy of their consideration before they arraign us, that they should purge themselves of that which attaches to them under this state of circumstances.

But besides that, let us go to the other end of the Capitol. What induced them, what brought the gentleman's friends there to vote for the Crittenden-Montgomery bill? It could not crush the Administration there. It could not defeat or control a measure there, and if they voted for it, and under those circumstances, they have not even the excuse which is offered by my friend from Ohio, in this end of the Capitol, for his vote.

Now, there are various other points which I would like to notice, but I have occupied as much time upon this occasion as I desire. One single word more and I have done. My friend from Ohio, says it is time reform and retrenchment were begun; that it is high time the doctrine of impeachment was inaugurated for the benefit of the President and other officers who violate the law of the land. All I have to say is, that so far as I know, the President of the United States has respected the law, and has discharged those obligations of duty which he owes to his oath and to the country which has honored him by an elevation to this distinguished position; and I have no doubt he will stand as faithfully by the law in time to come, and be as prompt to execute it whenever occasion arises, as any man in the past history of the country, who has filled the presidential office. But, if he has violated the law, let me tell my friend from Ohio, if he wants to begin impeachment, now is "the accepted time." Bring forward your articles of impeachment. If he has violated the law in any respect, let the matter be inquired into, and let him be tried upon that impeachment before the country, and if guilty let him be condemned and driven from office.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Who will try him?

Mr. LEITER. I desire to say a word to the gentleman from Virginia. I propose to impeach the President on the Cincinnati platform.

Mr. LETCHER. That is a clear point, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEITER. I wish to call attention to the fifth resolution of the Cincinnati platform, and I will read it; and then I propose to inquire how it has been carried out. It is as follows:

"That it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs."

Mr. LETCHER. Just at that point let me inquire of the gentleman from Ohio if he knows of any violation of that part of the platform?

Mr. LEITER. I do not know that there has been any rigid economy, or economy of any kind enforced. The resolution goes on to say:

"And no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government, and for the gradual but certain extinction of the public debt."

Mr. LETCHER. Let me inquire of the gentleman whether he did not vote to take the money out of the Treasury before the last session of Congress closed, and have it deposited with the States?

Mr. LEITER. Not by any means. No, sir.

Mr. LETCHER. Then you are a rara avis in that flock.

Mr. LEITER. I certainly did not vote for that. Mr. LETCHER. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. LEITER. I do not want my friend from Virginia to escape from the fifth resolution by charging back upon me. I want to know what kind of economy has been used, or what kind of efforts have been made to reduce the public debt under this resolution?

Mr. LETCHER. I do not want to escape from anything in this connection. If my friend will undertake to designate any one measure of this Congress which he regards as extravagant and profligate, and in violation of that resolution, I should be glad to be informed of it.

Mr. LEITER. I say there has been scarcely an appropriation made here which is not an exaggeration of what we have had before.

Mr. LETCHER. When my friend has to resort to his memory, and walks over the record, I think he is in rather a bad way. The record of what we have done during this session is before him; the bills we have passed, the propositions considered here, the amount of money they involve, and the particular votes given upon both sides of the House in connection with them; and if any one of them is in violation of law, if there has been a profligate or extravagant expenditure of the public money, it is the easiest and simplest thing in the world to designate it and hold it up to the reprobation of the country. I cannot undertake to answer the general charge that he regards everything done here as an exaggeration on what has been done before. Is it an exaggeration to pay your officers of the Government, the President and heads of Departments, clerks, and others, the surveyors of your land offices? And if it is not, is it profligacy and extravagance to employ men to enable this Government to carry on its operations and to execute the commissions within their charge?

Mr. COBB. The greatest extravagance, I apprehend, that we have been guilty of during the present Congress, was voting six million acres of land, without any consideration, for agricultural purposes.

Mr. LEITER. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will absolve me from any such act.

Mr. LETCHER. That vote was altogether owing to the fact that my friend still has a remnant of his old Democracy left. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEITER. The indorsement of my Democracy, coming from the gentleman from Virginia, will not add much to my credit as a Democrat, I am afraid.

Mr. LETCHER. I am very sorry for it. If my indorsement does not give him credit, I think he is in a bad way to get it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEITER. I want to come back to my inquiry. If economy has been practiced, in what has it been done, when the expenditures are higher now than they ever have been, in every department of the Government? Is that the kind of economy which we were to have had under the fifth resolution of the Cincinnati platform? And if it be, why not have informed the people that you intended, by your economy, to increase the expenditures in every department of the Government?

Mr. LETCHER. How are our expenditures made? Are they made by the President, or by the Departments of the Government, or are they made by the votes of the representatives of the people here and in the other wing of the Capitol? Now, if appropriations are made, and if a portion of one party votes for them and a portion of the other party votes for them, and if, in that way, a majority is acquired, does the gentleman undertake to say that the fault lies with the President, and not with the members of both branches of Congress?

Mr. LEITER. If these propositions did not meet the favor of the Administration, why did not the President exercise his veto?

Mr. LETCHER. There, again, I am very glad to hear the gentleman. That is good Democratic doctrine, too. But, suppose that veto had come: would we not have had the cry raised again that the country was threatened with a revolution because the President was seeking to trample down the voice of the people, expressed through their Representatives? Now, I say very frankly to the gentleman—and he knows that I am not in the habit of voting very liberally here; the fact is, that most of them think I am rather illiberal—that I do vorily believe, as God is my judge, that if I was President of the United States, I would have a quire or two of blank vetoes printed for every session, and I would send them here whenever a chance offered. I think the President might very well veto a good deal of what we do here; and I am only sorry that the veto power is not more frequently exercised in checking what I think to be not right legislation. That is my idea about it.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. LETCHER. Hallo! you are not coming in? [Laughter.]

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. Chairman, the objection that I have got to the policy of the present Administration is this: I want it understood that I do not belong to that (the Republican) side of the House; but I belong to this side, (the Democratic,) by the minute or hour, as it may suit me.

Mr. LETCHER. In other words, you are a sort of migratory Democrat. [Laughter.]

Mr. SEWARD. I am a little in that line; and I think the gentleman [Mr. LETCHER] will have to migrate soon, or he will find himself in bad company.

Mr. LETCHER. I am waiting for my friend to explain what he is at.

Mr. SEWARD. I was going to say this: at the last session of Congress, money was appropriated to do particular things; and I allude to a matter which was to be done in my own State, and which the Administration men here, this morning, generally voted against.

Several Democratic MEMBERS. I did not vote against it.

Mr. SEWARD. I am talking about some extreme southern men—those fixed, sedentary Democrats, who never do anything, but oppose everything.

Mr. LETCHER. There must be very few of them in this House, judging from the way my friends from Ohio, on the other side, talk. They say we are making a great many improper appropriations; but the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SEWARD], in consequence of the loss of that navy-yard down at Brunswick, thinks we are doing a very limited business.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman voted an appropriation of $285,800 in the way of an advance to Norfolk, while I only asked $300,000 to continue a work at Brunswick.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not think the navy-yard at Brunswick is laid out yet.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it staked off and surveyed?

Mr. SEWARD. Yes, sir, it is surveyed.

Mr. LETCHER. All staked off and surveyed? Has the gentleman had any notice from the Navy Department as to where the buildings are to be located?

Mr. SEWARD. Yes, sir; a naval officer was sent down there and reported; but the misfortune is, that the gentleman at the head of the Navy Department has lived so long in Connecticut that he is frozen up, and cannot be moved.

Mr. LETCHER. Where is the report of the naval officer who was sent down?

Mr. SEWARD. It is in the Navy Department; but I never go to the Department to hunt up these matters.

Mr. LETCHER. I suppose that, if my friend had gone to hunt up that report and brought it here and convinced us that it was right, he would have stood a very good chance for his $300,000; but he did not go to look after it, and how was the House to know how to vote?

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman does not understand me. There was no recommendation from the Navy Department, except in respect to particular navy-yards, which seem to be the special favorites of the Navy Department and the Treasury Department and the Administration throughout.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not know how that is. The Navy Department has sent us estimates for the navy-yards scattered all over the country—north, south, east, and west.

Mr. SEWARD. I give the gentleman notice that if I get the floor I will give my views generally on the whole subject.

Mr. LETCHER. I am sure I have no objection to my friend giving us his views on the subject; but I say that so far as these appropriations are concerned, so far as they have come under my observation as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, I have not seen the first evidence of sectional feeling or sectional prejudice in the recommendations made for our consideration; and, sir, it strikes me—if I am not altogether mistaken—that there is still $70,000 of this Brunswick appropriation unexpended.

Mr. SEWARD. Yes; and that is what I complain of: that the Administration, by refusing to spend that money, while I have been urging them to do it for twelve months, and applying their veto power to it, have overridden the legislation of Congress.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not know why the Secretary of the Navy has acted as my friend says he has; but if he would not spend this $70,000, will my friend be good enough to tell me how he expected to get him to spend this $300,000?

Mr. SEWARD. I wished to put that on to him as a weight to drag him along.

Mr. LETCHER. Then you were going to hitch the Treasury to him, or him to the Treasury?

Mr. SEWARD. God forbid! The Treasury has been ruined badly enough already, without hitching it to such a dead carcass.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I am only surprised that my friend wanted to hitch on two negative bodies.

One or two words more, and I have done.

Mr. LEITER. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that, by the interference of the gentleman from Georgia, I have not lost the privilege of having a little conversation with the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LETCHER. Go on; I want to know what it is.

Mr. LEITER. I want the gentleman from Virginia to specify to this House where the President, or the Administration, or the Democratic party, have paid any of the public debt?

Mr. LETCHER. Why, sir, one of the very grounds of complaint was, that Governor Cobb, when he came into office, had taken money to redeem the public debt which he ought to have reserved for the expenditures of the Administration. That was the very ground of complaint when the Treasury-note bill was before us. He was commended for it in the northern cities, while it was condemned here in the discussion.

Mr. LEITER. He did it at just such a premium as would ruin any man engaged in business.

Mr. LETCHER. Then it seems to me that my friend is going to ruin the Secretary any way. [Laughter.] When I show him that the point is not well taken, he still insists that, although the fact is not as he supposed, yet the Secretary has done wrong.

Mr. LEITER. I want to designate where I think money has been expended to very little purpose. I wish to know where the President got his authority for declaring war against Utah? And then I wish the gentleman to tell the House where the President got the authority for the money which has been expended upon that war?

Mr. LETCHER. Well, in the first place, the gentleman and I do not agree in the fact that he has declared war against Utah.

Mr. LEITER. Well, he has waged war.

Mr. LETCHER. He has done this: when he sent out Government officers to take charge of that Territory, he deemed it to be an act of prudence on his part to accompany those Government officers with the means of protection and defense. For the purpose of doing—what? For the purpose of installing them in their offices, and of aiding in executing the laws. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that an application is now before us from a portion of the people of Utah for the organization of the Territory of Nevada, on the ground that the authorities of Utah will not execute the laws, even for the punishment of the crime of murder? Then, was it not an act of prudence, of sound judgment, and of proper discretion, on the part of the President, that he should accompany the officers with the means of seeing that the laws were executed and fairly carried out?

Mr. LEITER. I answer that, so far from it being an act of prudence, I believe that the President has been misled by designing men, and when he got his army there—

Mr. LETCHER. So far as that is concerned, I think the gentleman, if he knew more about the President, would agree with me that he is about as hard to lead as any other piece of humanity in this country. [Laughter.] Neither designing men nor undesigning men could make much headway in leading him; and I think, from what I have seen, it would be a troublesome operation to drive him.

Mr. LEITER. Is it not a fact, that a private citizen of the United States went out to the Territory and brought about peace—if there was any trouble—before the army got near it?

Mr. LETCHER. I have never heard of it. If it is, I do not know it. The first intimation I have had that any private citizen was trying to bring about an arrangement, was what I saw in the newspapers about Mr. Kane, of whom I never heard before, who, it was stated, had gone there and had made some arrangement by which Governor Cumming was to enter Salt Lake City and take charge of the territorial government. But if, as the gentleman says, the President sent the army there for the purpose of declaring war and using it offensively, will he tell me why the army has not been so used when it is upon the ground?

Mr. LEITER. I cannot say, unless it be from the fact that the President had not nerve enough to carry out his design.

Mr. LETCHER. I take it that if the President had nerve enough to call out the Army, and send it across the plains to Utah, in violation of law, and in violation of his official duty, as the gentleman says he did, he would have had nerve enough to give the order to fire the guns when the people set themselves up in opposition to the laws.

Mr. LEITER. They did not get within range of firing guns at all. Everything was peaceful and quiet.

Mr. LETCHER. They could have been within range if they had chosen to go.

Mr. LEITER. I desire to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. LETCHER. Be quick, then; it must be the last. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. LEITER. If the gentleman has only five minutes left, I will not interrupt him.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] undertook to make another point on the Administration in the way of extravagance. He referred to the custom-house at New Orleans, and said that it was sinking, and had been built where it probably could not stand. I concur in that opinion; and I can say, as the gentleman knows, and as every gentleman here perhaps knows, that I have been opposed to these appropriations for custom-houses ever since I came to Congress. But if the New Orleans custom-house is chargeable to anybody, go back and put the blame upon the Administration that preceded General Pierce's, under which the work was started, and under which your policy of building custom-houses began. The work was commenced then; and ever since that time they have been calling for additional appropriations, and telling us that, if we do not make them, every dollar which has been heretofore applied to make the works available and useful will be thrown away.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. The gentleman will find that the custom-house at New Orleans was commenced under the administration of President Polk. The first law was passed in 1848.

Mr. LETCHER. The work was commenced in 1850 or 1851, and Mr. Polk went out in March, 1849.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I would say to the gentleman that there was a Democratic majority in both branches of Congress in 1850.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. And there has been ever since, except in the House during the last Congress.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, now, let us see. There are some custom-houses up in Maine. [Laughter.] And I would remind my friend over there that he probably voted for some of them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. LETCHER. Then my honorable friend from Ohio—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LETCHER. For a single moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. As the gentleman from Virginia has alluded to Maine, he will allow me to say, that while his party friends were asking very large appropriations for custom-houses in his part of the country; for instance, for a custom-house in New Orleans, which we are told is to cost $4,000,000; for one in Charleston to cost over two millions, and for other places in the same proportion; I believe that some two or three appropriations of $20,000 and $50,000 each were made for custom-houses in Maine. The gentleman has inquired who are responsible for the vast appropriations which have been made for the last few years, and seems to be in pursuit of knowledge under apparent difficulties, and I will endeavor to enlighten him, if he will permit me, by stating that his party has been in the majority in both branches of Congress for ten years past, unless he would except the last two, when the balance of power was held in the House of Representatives by the American party. It was during the ascendancy of his party in both Houses, that such measures as the Texas gratuity of $2,500,000, and the Gadsden treaty, requiring $10,000,000, for a patch of land which Colonel Benton said was of the value of but a few thousand, were passed by the votes of his party, including, I believe, the gentleman's own vote; and I would remind him that at the present session they have passed a deficiency bill for some eleven million dollars, over five of which were for the Utah war—a war made by the President without the shadow of authority; and now, that the people are called on to foot the bills, he asks who it is that have caused these enormous appropriations? These are specimens of the instances I could cite, if time, or the consent of the other side of the House, would permit.

Mr. LETCHER. There is this material difference between New Orleans and Charleston, and those places in Maine—at the former the revenue collected exceeds the expenses of collecting it, but that is not the case in the latter. Now, if the Democratic party did wrong in voting for these things heretofore, why did not the gentleman from Maine set us an example in the last Congress by voting against them? Why did he vote as (as he says) the Democratic party in Congress had voted before? Why did the gentleman vote for these measures, when I and other gentlemen on this side of the House were fighting against them, and using whatever influence we had to defeat them?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SEWARD. I shall not detain the committee long. I desire to say what I have to say, briefly and pointedly.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Will the gentleman give way to allow me to move that the committee rise, for the purpose of terminating debate upon this bill in one hour?

Mr. SEWARD. No, sir; the gentleman from Pennsylvania has no claims upon my courtesy, and I grant none.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to consider to some extent the present policy of this Administration, and, in the same connection, to review, to some extent, a portion of the legislation of the present session of Congress, and to show that the South itself, which always complains, through certain of her Representatives here, of oppression and injustice, is untrue to herself, and is pursuing a policy ruinous to her prospects, ruinous to her commerce, and detrimental to her agricultural interests. There are a certain class of gentlemen from the South who always profess to economize, and who oppose everything; who, in face of the fact that gentlemen of the North have the numerical strength, and yet, upon appropriations, are always fair to us, come so strongly up to oppose the interests of the South.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of southern gentlemen to the character and policy of their votes, this morning, affecting the navy-yard in my own district, at Brunswick, Georgia, established by the last Congress. It will be remembered that I asked for an appropriation of $300,000 to continue the works contemplated by the act of 1857, establishing a navy-yard there. The objection raised was that the work had been abandoned. Now, let us see how gentlemen stand upon the record. Here are the appropriations for the repairs and improvements of navy-yards, contained in this bill:

Portsmouth.....	$52,915
Boston.....	203,500
New York.....	269,516
Philadelphia.....	97,214
Washington.....	99,100
Norfolk.....	285,801
Pensacola.....	247,365
Mare's Island.....	307,971
Total.....	$1,572,682

Now, I call the attention of the House to this appropriation for Norfolk; and yet I believe every member of the Virginia delegation, with two exceptions, voted against the appropriation of $300,000 for Brunswick. The entire amount appropriated in this bill for repairs, &c., of navy-yards at other points is something over one million five hundred and seventy-two thousand six hundred and eighty-two dollars; and yet gentlemen are not willing that even $300,000 should be appropriated to continue this work.

Now, sir, why do I complain of the Administration? Sir, with the great respect which I have for the Secretary of the Treasury—and he is a man whom I like, a man of ability—I say that his policy, either from wrong opinions, or from having bad advisers around him, is one, in my opinion, (though, I am satisfied, not designed by him,) tending to crush out the interest of the South, and of the State from whence he comes. I stated just now that the Administration, by refusing to make application of the money appro-riated by the last Congress, in carrying out the munificent measure of legislation to which I have alluded, served effectually to strike down the interests of the South. What does Mr. Secretary Cobb say in a recent letter addressed to this House, asking a loan of $15,000,000? He speaks of the exhausted condition of the Treasury. Now, suppose the money had been appropriated that was in the Treasury on the incoming of this Administration—a surplus of $17,000,000—to these works provided for, not only at Brunswick, but the several court-houses and post offices which were authorized to be built in the southern States? There was money enough in the Treasury at that time to have completed the whole of them. I think the estimate for the present year was only a little over one million dollars. That money should have been reserved, and appropriated faithfully to the purposes designated by Congress in its legislation. But the money is gone now, and when you call on one of these Departments, and ask for the prosecution of these works, you are told there is no money, and the work cannot progress. But, when they come to make recommendations for other portions of the Union besides my own State, they can recommend $1,500,000 for repairs of navy-yards, while they cannot carry out and expend even the little appropriation made in the last Congress to continue the work in my State. Sir, I have the right to complain. I never go to the Department to ask what I shall do.

Now, then, having disposed of my objections to the Administration in that regard, I come down to the policy of this House to show the injustice of its organization. While I say it with all due respect to gentlemen occupying a high seat upon this floor, yet, Mr. Chairman, from the time Congress became organized, from the election of your Speaker, the great object of inquiry was to know how much political power could be brought to bear to favor the Administration in power. Men were selected for prominent places on your committees with regard to their political strength in the country, and selecting them from great political centers. Sir, you can have no healthy legislation while such things are continued. Your Government has become morbid and diseased, if not entirely rotten. Why, sir, it is known that a few men in this House have the entire control of its legislation, and until some power of disturbance arises; until the other members of the House will resist this kind of arrangement, and break it down, they can never have legislation that will be such as it ought to be. Why, sir, the committees are raised for the purpose of carrying out the will of the Departments. Why, sir, when I go there in the morning, upon business for the section of country from which I come, I find these gentlemen there so thick that the pavement seems to be worn smooth by the frequency of their calls.

It is high time, Mr. Chairman, that this arrangement was broken up, this combination dissolved, or else the country must suffer under it. When we are called on to pay a private claim, or a debt of the Government, these gentlemen resist the payment of either. They legislate simply to provide the payment of salaries to feed the party in power.

I do not complain of the Administration because it has no money in the Treasury. Acting under a policy generally agreed to at the adjournment of the previous Congress, Secretary Cobb devoted a large portion of the then surplus fund to the purchase of the United States debt. It is not this that I complain of, had the laws of Congress been executed. The trouble is, that the Administration has become alarmed at the present condition of commerce. They ought to have sent in a message asking for $50,000,000 at once, and not have irritated the public mind by these constant applications for issues of Treasury notes and authority to obtain loans. The Administration is not responsible because the importations under the tariff are not sufficient to supply the amount of revenue desired by the Government. The financial embarrassment which occurred a short time since begat a system of economy in every quarter of the Union. Our people diminished their expenses. There was a less demand for the goods which pay duties. Necessarily, therefore, the revenue became deficient. Even under your tariff system, however, the Government is but a borrower. No party could have

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to speak upon the financial policy of the Government and its expenditures, but I cannot do it in five minutes, and must therefore defer to some other time. I expected, when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] took the floor, to hear some reasons why the expenditures of the Government have increased more than a third in five years, and almost one half in eight years. But he fails to assign any in answer to the very able speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] He chose to divert attention from the point by attempting to make the last Congress responsible for the increase in the expenditures of the Government. Everybody knows that the Senate was Democratic in the last Congress, and no party had a majority in the House. The Republicans certainly could not be charged with having any control over the Senate, or of having any influence or control over the Executive. That party, therefore, cannot be held responsible for the appropriations made in the last Congress. They had not the power to do anything by themselves, even in this branch of Congress, which was the only department of the Government in which they had any strength, for they were in a minority here, and only elected their Speaker by a plurality vote. Moreover, I take it that the gentleman from Virginia voted for all the appropriations that were passed, so it does not lie in his mouth to charge the blame of these appropriations on the Republicans. In the last Congress, the miscellaneous bill sent by the House to the Senate, came back with amendments amounting to about three million dollars addition attached to it; and when we attempted to curtail those large additions made by the Senate, we failed.

The gentleman only instanced one case of an appropriation that he thought was extravagant; and that was $75,000 for the ocean telegraph. What else did he refer to?

Mr. LETCHER. What did the vessels cost that were engaged in laying down that telegraph? Mr. GROW. You may just as well send your vessels to aid in laying down the telegraph cable as send them to the Mediterranean, and all over the world, to bring persons to our shores as guests.

Mr. LETCHER. I did not vote for that.

Mr. GROW. I presume the gentleman did not; nor did I vote for it. But your objection was to the cost of these vessels engaged in laying down the telegraph cable. Why might you not just as well employ them in that way as to send them over the world to bring guests to our shores? During this very session a vessel of war has been sent abroad, to carry an ex-President and his family on a mission of health. Why did you instance that against the Republicans? You are engaged in no war in which your Navy is employed; and what have you for it to do, in which it can be better employed, than in a useful enterprise to advance the intercourse of nations? The expense of keeping it up is no greater than for it to be cruising around the world. Everything which the gentleman instanced added nothing to the expenses of the Government. He instanced the land grants. I voted against those grants with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER] but how have they swollen the expenses of the Government? No money has been, or is to be, taken from the Treasury by any of those grants. In every single instance referred to by the gentleman from Virginia, no money was expended, or is to be, by the Government, save in the case of the ocean telegraph; and that was only $75,000, to be reimbursed to this Government in paying for its communications with its ministers abroad. It was but an outlay in advance for what you are now expending money. I am reminded by a friend near me that even the $75,000 is not to be used until the telegraph is in operation, which is true. So not one cent has been expended for that.

The gentleman had an hour in which to explain why the expenditures of the Government last year, exclusive of the public debt, amounted to the sum of $65,032,559 76, when for the year ending 30th June, 1852, they amounted to only $40,389,954 56, and the year ending 30th June, 1850, they amounted to but $37,165,990 09, but he did not attempt to do it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN stated that the hour having arrived at which general debate was closed upon the bill by the order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] was entitled to the floor for one hour if he desired to occupy it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not desire to occupy it, but I wish to give notice to the committee that I shall insist on the debate being strictly confined to the pending amendments.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by clauses, for amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

Page 2, lines twenty-three and twenty-four, strike out "$980,928," and insert in lieu thereof, "$380,652 65," so that the clause will read:

For subsistence in kind, $1,380,652 65.

This is a large reduction in consequence of its having been provided for in the deficiency bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

Page 2, in line twenty-six, strike out "$983,654 99," and insert "$1,062,654 99" in the following paragraph of the bill:

"For clothing for the Army, camp, and garrison equipage, $983,654 99."

This is an increase of $79,000 for clothing for the Army; the estimates for which did not come in soon enough to have them inserted in the bill. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I did not wish to disturb the Committee of Ways and Means in the amendments they had to offer; but I wish to offer an amendment in line twelve.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have passed that point, and they can return to it only by unanimous consent.

No objection being made, Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, offered the following amendment:

In line twelve insert the following:

Provided, That no Army officer shall be detailed on civil duty except where provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to reduce the appropriation $100,000 for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to a law of the Territorial Legislature of Utah recognizing indirectly the practice of polygamy, or at least placing the whole matter in the legal control and power of the priesthood.

Now, sir, I have before me the organic act of the Territory of Utah, which provides that all laws which have passed both Houses of the Legislature of the Territory shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States; and if disapproved, shall be null and void.

This is the law to which I referred, and of which the gentleman from Virginia seems to have no knowledge. The law of the Territorial Legislature of Utah will be found on page 103 of their laws. The first sections of the act incorporate the Church of Latter Day Saints, including all those of the Mormon faith; section three places the whole subject, whether regarded as marriage or other ceremony—whether "temporal expansion or spiritual increase"—in the hands of the church, and not to be otherwise legally meddled with. The section is as follows:

"Sec. 3. And be it further ordained, That as said church holds the constitutional and original right, in common with all civil and religious communities, 'to worship God according to the dictates of conscience'; to reverence communion agreeably to the principles of truth, and to solemnize marriage compatible with the revelations of Jesus Christ, for the security and full enjoyment of all blessings and privileges embodied in the religion of Jesus Christ, free to all; it is also declared, that said church does, and shall possess and enjoy continually, the power and authority, in and of itself, to originate, make, pass, and establish rules, regulations, ordinances, laws, customs, and criterions, for the good order, safety, government, convenience, comfort, and control of said church, and for the punishment or forgiveness of all offenses relative to fellowship, according to church covenants; that the pursuit of bliss and the enjoyment of life, in every capacity of public association and domestic happiness, temporal expansion, or spiritual increase upon the earth, may not legally be questioned: Provided, however, That each and every act, or practice, so established, or adopted, for law or custom, shall relate to solemnities, sacraments, ceremonies, consecrations, endowments, tithings, marriages, fellowship, or the religious duties of man to his Maker; inasmuch as the doctrines, principles, practices, or performances, support virtue, and increase morality, and are not inconsistent with, or repugnant to, the Constitution of the United States, or of this State, and are founded in the revelations of the Lord."

Mr. QUITMAN. I rise to a question of order. I submit that this is not pertinent to the amendment which the gentleman has offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the question of order.

Mr. MORRILL. I have said all I desired to say, and will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move the following amendment, to come in in line eighty-five:

For repairs of barracks at Baton Rouge, Louisiana, the sum of $25,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana is liable to this objection: the paragraph of this bill from line seventy-eight to line eighty-five, makes provisions for barracks, including the same one for which the gentleman proposes to appropriate specially.

Mr. DAVIDSON. The amendment I have offered was prepared by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER] and I will refer the gentleman from Pennsylvania to him for such explanation as he desires to have.

Mr. LETCHER. I will make a statement: At an early part of this session the papers connected with this matter were referred by the House to the Committee of Ways and Means, and they fell into my hands. When they came there I applied at the War Department for the purpose of obtaining information in regard to them. The estimates, it seemed to me, were large, and I had not been informed, up to that time, that they had procured iron joists and other iron improvements suggested in the bill of particulars. The Department told me that the repairs could be made, and the property preserved for the sum in the amendment. If gentlemen had time to read the papers in the case, they would be satisfied that the repairs are indispensably necessary if the property is not to go to absolute decay.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. What is the amount asked for?

Mr. LETCHER. The amendment provides for $25,000. Forty-one thousand nine hundred and sixty-six dollars was the amount of the estimate, but that included iron beams, joists, and other iron work; but the Government thought that they were not necessary, and that the repairs could be made with wood sufficient for the purpose of preserving the building.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The appropriation was reduced from $41,955 to $25,000.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Yes, sir; and I have agreed to it.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment, to come in after the clause for ordnance and ordnance stores:

For the purchase of gunpowder for the land service $100,000.

This is rendered necessary by the improvements which have been made in ordnance. The gunpowder on hand has failed to answer the purpose, and for the effective use of the present ordnance it is deemed proper that this provision should be made.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. QUITMAN. I offer the following amendment:

For the alteration of old arms so as to make them breech-loading guns, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of War, $100,000.

I offer that amendment in good faith. We have on hand a vast quantity of old muskets. Since their construction great and important changes and improvements have been made, and they would not now, in their present condition, be placed, in case of war, in the hands of our soldiers. They have, at present, a value in market not exceeding three dollars each. Probably they could not be sold for that. They are useless now, but they can be made of good service by the application to them of the breech-loading principle, and other like inventions. It seems, from experiments that have been made, that that change can be effected at a cost of $3 50. They will then be worth twenty dollars each, which is the price the Government pays for that arm.

Mr. MORGAN. Are the changes to be made at the armories?

Mr. QUITMAN. Yes, sir. The superintendent has made a great many experiments on the subject, and the Secretary of War has written a letter to the committee, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the letter is read, I will ask the gentleman a question. I ask it in a spirit which will be appreciated, I know. The bill, I understand, proposes to appropriate $400,000 for the manufacture of arms at the national armories. This proposition proposes to increase that by $100,000. Why is it necessary to make this increase of $100,000 to accomplish this change, which, from all I can learn, is very desirable? Why cannot the appropriation in the bill provide for it?

Mr. QUITMAN. I can answer the question satisfactorily. In the first place, the appropriation in the bill would not authorize the Secretary of War to make the changes, and in the second place, these changes will cost so much more than the $400,000, which is based upon particular estimates.

The Clerk read the letter of the Secretary of War, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, May 15, 1858.

SIR: Valuable improvements have been made in breech-loading arms, which promise great advantages to the Government, as by them old muskets and rifles, which have become unfit for issue to the troops, and such as have been heretofore sold for from three to five dollars each, may, for a moderate sum, be altered so as to equal the best breech-loading arms.

These improvements promise such great advantages and benefit to the Government, that I have to request an appropriation of $100,000, to be used in altering old muskets and rifles into breech-loading arms.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN B. FLOYD, Secretary of War.

Hon. JOHN A. QUITMAN, Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Does the gentleman intend to oppose the amendment?

Mr. CURTIS. I am rather inclined to oppose the amendment; but I am more inclined to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that he may conclude his remarks.

Mr. QUITMAN. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Iowa; but, instead of saying anything further, I will simply ask that the report of Major Bell, in reference to this change, may be read.

The report was read, as follows.

Memoranda for the Hon. HENRY WILSON, member of Military Committee of the Senate, concerning the application of Morse's breech-loading principle to the muzzle-loading arms of the United States; that is to say, to the rifle-musket, caliber 69-100 inch; to the musket, smooth-bore, caliber 69-100 inch; and to the rifle, caliber 54-100 inch.

The Secretary of War, esteeming Morse's breech-loading principle the best, directed its application at this arsenal to one of each of the above-mentioned old arms, whereof we have large numbers now on hand in the State and United States arsenals. This application was to be made with the least possible change or expense in the arms; the object of the Secretary in the experiment being both efficiency and economy—efficiency in producing a more perfect arm than had yet been made, and economy in avoiding the contemplated sale of these old arms, necessarily at a great sacrifice. The result of the experiment is shown in the form of the arms which I had the honor to exhibit to you in the committee, on Saturday morning last, by direction of the Secretary of War.

1. Advantages.—The change in these arms is very small—only in a part of the lock and in the lower part of the barrel, everything else remaining the same. The estimated cost of this change, when effected by machinery, being from two dollars and fifty cents to three dollars and fifty cents per arm.

2. The strength of the barrels and other parts after the changes is found most ample—one of the altered arms having sustained one thousand three hundred and fifty rounds of service charge without injury.

3. Facility of fire.—Its advantages over the muzzle-loader, in its breech-loading facilities, with its barrel always level and directed to the front, whether on horse, standing or advancing, sitting, lying or kneeling, gives it both greater celerity as well as greater accuracy of fire on these accounts.

4. Accuracy of fire.—But its superior accuracy over the muzzle-loader is more particularly due to the fact that the construction of the cartridge, and of its chamber in the barrel, is such that when the gun is charged the axes of the ball and bore are necessarily in the same vertical plane of projection at the moment of fire, whereby they fulfill the most important requisite for accuracy of fire.

5. Force of the charge.—The force of the charge is necessarily greater than that of the corresponding muzzle-loader of the same caliber and charge of powder, because the cap being fired in the center of the charge, without vent or vent discharge, the whole effect, therefore, of the cap and of the charge of powder goes to move the ball; whereas in the muzzle-loader the effect of the vent-discharge is lost to the motion of the ball. Accordingly, the penetrations of this gun, at thirty yards, are from one to one and a half inch boards greater than those of the muzzle-loader. And its range also, with the same elevation, proportionally greater.

6. Certainty of fire.—As the cap is fired in contact with the powder, the certainty of fire is greater than that of any other breech or muzzle loading arm fired without the charge. In consequence, this arm never misses fire with a good cap.

7. Cleanliness of fire.—This arm is remarkable for cleanliness of bore after many fires; this being because a new chamber with every new charge is inserted at every fire, the old one being then withdrawn. Whereas, in the muzzle-loader, the chamber being always the same, is accumulating filth at every fire, which, at every fire, the ball carries forward in the bore. This gives much less accuracy of fire to the muzzle-loader.

8. Safety from explosion.—It has been charged against this arm that the cap being in contact with the powder there is danger of explosions from this cartridge in magazines and laboratories. But there is no such danger, as the projecting charge has no existence as a cartridge, except in the cartridge-box of the soldier, who forms it with surprising facility by merely pouring the powder into their chamber, and inserting the ball and cap, the wad and chamber being always ready, and then turning it into the cartridge-box. Having the balls and the flask of powder, this may be done at any time, even in the field in presence of the enemy. As the cartridge in the cartridge-box rests on wood, the percussion could not, therefore, take effect there, if it could be made in the cartridge-box, which it could not be in consequence of the structure of the box.

9. Saving.—It is claimed for this arm that all the labor in magazines and laboratories which is now devoted to the manufacture and preservation of muzzle-loader paper cartridges, is saved, as it needs only powder and ball. It is also claimed for it that the trains for transportation of ammunition for small arms will be greatly reduced, besides saving much material of paper, twine, and lumber, nails, &c.

10. The cartridge of this arm being water-proof, is greatly superior to the paper cartridge of the muzzle-loader. The latter, in a cartridge-box, might spoil in a few days' rainy weather, while that of this arm would not be affected for years.

Which is respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM H. BELL,

Major Ordnance.

WASHINGTON ARSENAL, May 26, 1858.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I now hope the committee will allow the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] to proceed for five minutes, as he has yielded his time to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I object.

Mr. AVERY. In connection with this matter, I desire to make this inquiry of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means: whether this recommendation of $400,000 in the bill for the manufacture of arms was made in view of another appropriation of $100,000 to change the present arms into breech-loading arms? If not, then why should you not take $100,000 out of that appropriated in the bill for the purpose, instead of appropriating that additional sum, and thereby making an appropriation of $100,000?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The $100,000 is necessary as well as the $400,000; and the reason why it was not included in the bill, was because the estimate was sent to the Committee of Ways and Means too late. I have no doubt that what the gentleman from Mississippi has said is true, but the only difficulty is the increased expenditure in this branch of public service.

The question was taken; and Mr. QUITMAN's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington. I move to amend line one hundred and forty-nine by increasing the sum appropriated for surveys for military defenses $10,000. By reading the clause which I propose to amend, you will perceive that it is for surveys for military defenses, geographical explorations and reconnoissances for military purposes, &c. Under an appropriation made by a previous Congress, a survey has been made for military purposes, or is now being made, of the river Colorado. That was an important service; but we have another river upon our slope, a larger river, the Columbia, which should likewise be surveyed for military purposes. It should be surveyed, in order that we may know what we can do with it in the transportation of troops. Upon the river are many rapids—the Cascades, the Dalles, Priest's rapids, the Buckland rapids, Ross's rapids, and the Kettle Falls, near Colville, where a military post is about to be established. Colville is surrounded by a gold region, and is some distance east of the Cascade mountains. Those who have observed the last California papers will find that there is a large increase of gold miners in that region, some going by the way of Columbia river, and others by the waters of the Sound, taking their course thence by Frazier's river. From Frazier's river there is a trail to Colville. Now, for military purposes, we want to know how far we can use the Columbia river in the transportation of troops.

At the Walla-Walla there is a post of four or five companies; and the fact that supplies can now be transported by sailing vessels and steamers on the Columbia, from a short distance above the Dalles, to old Fort Walla-Walla, has enabled the quartermaster general's department to reduce, by nearly one half, the expenses of that department in the way of transportation. A small sum of money, applied to the survey of this river, would enable military officers to ascertain whether they can send their troops and supplies on the river to Colville by steam, of which there is little doubt; for, on that river, the Hudson bay barges have run since the Hudson's Bay Company have established posts in the country. The navigation of the river by steam is important to the defense of the interior. We have, on the banks of the river, Indian tribes, numbering eight thousand souls, and two thousand warriors—not fish-eating Indians, but the Indians of the plains; rich in horses, in cattle; known to be adventurous and brave; and whom not only the regular troops, but the volunteers of the two Territories have met in arms within the last two or three years. Here we find the English Government, through the Hudson's Bay Company, doing everything it can to stimulate the resources of the country north of the forty-ninth parallel. All the appliances of that company—its steamers, its officers, its capital—are now being made use of to carry the stream of emigration by Frazier's and Townsend's rivers into the English territory. The determining whether we can navigate the Columbia by steamers will tend, incidentally, to give our people something of the protection of the Government, and enable them to compete with the subjects of a foreign Power.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to ask the gentleman from Washington Territory whether a military survey of the Columbia has not been made already by Captain Cram?

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington. It has not been surveyed by Captain Cram, or by any one else. In 1853, Dr. Sukely went down in a canoe and made some examinations with two men.

In regard to the gold region in that country, I will say, that we have known for the last three years that there was an extensive mining region there, perhaps as rich as the mining regions of California. Last winter two men took out $4,000 of gold in two weeks. In the neighborhood of Colville we have had from fifty to two hundred miners for the last two years, making never less than five dollars a day.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not propose to take any issue with the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me. I wish to oppose the amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the gentleman desires to oppose the amendment I will yield to him. He will allow me simply to state that the Secretary asked us in the first instance for $75,000. That was estimated at the opening of the session, and was appropriated. He subsequently asked for $20,000 more, making the appropriation $95,000; and now this amendment is in addition to that.

Mr. BLAIR. I rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment, because I have understood that Captain Cram had made a military survey of the Columbia, and of Oregon and a portion of Washington Territories, and that survey is now in the War Department.

Mr. LANE. I desire to say to the gentleman from Missouri, that all the survey and examination that Captain Cram ever made, he made by proxy.

Mr. BLAIR. That is a thing often done. Gentlemen who have charge of surveys have the surveys often made by those under them—or by proxy, as the gentleman from Oregon has said. But there is now in the War Department a report of a military survey of Oregon and Washington Territories, and of a portion of California, made by Captain Cram. That report contains a great deal of information also on another very interesting subject—the subject of the war debt claimed by these two Territories; and I hope that before making this appropriation for the service we shall call for the report of Captain Cram and have it printed.

Mr. MAYNARD. Why has it not been printed?

Mr. BLAIR. I think the reason is, that it was not desired to have too much light thrown on this war debt.

Mr. LANE. I desire to say that Captain Cram never made any survey of either of these Territories, and was never ordered to make a survey.

Mr. MAYNARD. Did he make a report?

Mr. LANE. He has never been authorized to make a report. The report which he did make was a voluntary one, and was so inaccurate that the Secretary of War rejected it.

Mr. BLAIR. The report which he made was approved by General Wool, in command of that military department.

Mr. LANE. Whenever the gentleman has anything to say about Washington and Oregon, let him come to me.

The question was taken on Mr. STEVENS's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington. I move to amend by increasing the appropriation $5,000. That will allow a survey to be made, either of a road from Colville to Puget Sound, or of the upper portion of the Columbia, which Captain Cram never saw, or any gentleman under him.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I raise the question of order that the amendment does not apply to the clause, and is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the amendment is merely to increase the appropriation $5,000; and, therefore, the Chair regards it as in order.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington. There are troops at Walla-Walla, troops at the Dalles, troops at Simcoe, and on the shores of Puget Sound.

Captain Cram's survey has been referred to. He made no survey covering the field which I now propose to occupy. His officers made no survey whatever covering it. The upper Columbia has never been touched by sounding line. In the year 1853, Dr. Sukely, a gentleman connected with my exploration of the northern route, went down that river in a canoe, and was able to ascertain the velocity of the current. From his examination it is quite obvious there will be no difficulty, as regards the velocity of the current, in using steamers on that river. But there is a question as to whether, in low water, we can run steamers over the rapids which I have enumerated in my remarks. We need a survey of that river for our military defenses. Captain Cram's report was not published, because, besides being grossly inaccurate, it was found that he had taken from everybody without giving them any credit. He speaks in his report of examinations, the result of his own field labor and research, of a country he never saw. That is a matter of record and proof in the War Department, and that, perhaps, may have been one of the reasons why the Military Committee of the Senate sent the report back to the War Department.

In my previous remarks I mentioned that a great saving had already been made in the transportation of troops to the Walla-Walla by using the river route. Captain Cram, in his report, stated that steamers could not be run above the Dalles. Now, from the Dalles to the Walla-Walla—a distance of one hundred and ten miles—vessels drawing four feet of water carried all the supplies for the quartermaster at Walla-Walla last year; and now steamers are doing the same service. Captain Cram pronounced the river unnavigable, when facts and experience show that a portion of it is navigable; and he pronounced it unnavigable, too, notwithstanding it had been pronounced probably navigable for steamers, the result of a rapid canoe examination, a year or two previously.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAIR. I am opposed to this amendment as to the other, and shall reply to the arguments of the gentleman from Washington by which he has attempted to sustain it. Sir, there was some motive which induced some gentlemen to examine this report of Captain Cram in manuscript, and to make a report on it to the head of the War Department, and to others, to suit probably their own purposes. You will find, by looking at the proceedings of the Senate, that the Secretary of War communicated letters commenting on this report from Mr. Stevens and Mr. A. A. Humphreys, a gentleman who is at the head of a bureau here, established without law by one of the Departments. These gentlemen had some motive to induce them to examine Captain Cram's report in manuscript. What that motive was, I shall not say; but, among other things, the report of Captain Cram gives a history of the origin of the war-bond debt of Oregon and Washington Territories. The committee of the Senate, instead of throwing the report back in the face of Captain Cram after making an examination for themselves, report what has been said about it by the Secretary of War, who derived his information from these gentlemen, who volunteered to examine the report for their own purposes; and the committee expressly say that they had not time, and could not examine the report for themselves.

The gentleman from Washington says that Captain Cram has taken information from others, and has not credited them with it. I do not know how that fact may be. Probably it was that information which he took from others which led him to make the mistake about the navigability of the river. But I undertake to say—and every man who knows Captain Cram will vouch for it—that whatever he has reported upon his own authority will be found strictly accurate. I believe that his report will be found valuable to the country, and, if for nothing else, to save us from the six million war bonds claimed by Oregon and Washington.

Of course, I have not examined the report. I do not know whether the statement of the gentleman from Washington with reference to his taking the reports of other persons of places he had never seen be correct or not. I presume the gentleman would not make the statement, after having read the report, unless there was something in it. But I believe that the report will be one of the most important that we can have, not only for the geographical information it will give, but also for information that will guide us in legislating on the very important claims of these Territories.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to amend the amendment, so as to reduce the appropriation, for the purpose of making a few remarks. I regret exceedingly that my friend from Washington should have found it necessary to impeach the character of one of the most distinguished and worthy officers in the United States Army. He has done it in this: He says that Captain Cram has made use of researches which other officers of the topographical department have made, and has not given them credit for it. Now, I feel it my duty to say that Captain Cram tells me himself, that he has given due credit for everything which he has taken from others. I have known him from my boyhood, and I know him to be one of the most moral, upright, and sagacious officers in the Army. I think, therefore, that the gentleman is mistaken when he says that Captain Cram has not given due credit to those who have made researches. But, sir, what researches are these that he is charged with using without giving due credit? What documents has he had access to? They are these voluminous documents for which we have paid hundreds of thousands of dollars, made under the direction of Congress, by various officers detailed for that purpose. Captain Cram was detailed by General Wool to take charge of the topographical duties of the Pacific department. It was his duty, as an officer in the discharge of this topographical position, to compile information from all the sources to which he had access, for the purpose of designating economical military arrangements, and it was his province to bring to the public attention everything that he possibly could do without additional expense, without either going himself, or sending other officers to make topographical explorations where they had been already made. He therefore had recourse to the public documents, and I have no doubt he has given full credit to the gentleman from Washington for his explorations, which are an important part of these public surveys.

We have not seen the work of Captain Cram. The gentleman seems to have been looking at the manuscript. Why is it not published? Why have we no opportunity of seeing if injustice is done to any one in the report? I have heard that it is suppressed by the Department. This is not the first time in my official business, since I came here, that I have found reports made by officers of the topographical engineers have been altered and amended so as to conform to other reports and other views. Such alterations or suppressions I consider unlawful, unjust, and injurious to the public service.

If Captain Cram's report does not suit the officers of the War Department, let it be published, so that the conflict of opinion may be observed by Congress as well as by the executive officers. We want the benefit of conflicting opinions, not the concrete idea of a single view of the subject's importance. I protest against this impeachment of an officer before his report is before Congress and the public: an officer who, for thirty years, has stood before the country unimpeached and unimpeachable.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington. I have no controversy with Captain Cram. What I said is what I know upon evidence complete and conclusive on the files of the War Department. And not only that, but he was guilty of making gross attacks upon the War Department. Let me say to the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] that I desired to have all that report published, and I believe my friend from Oregon [Mr. LANE] concurred with me in that desire. One half that report is given to the Indian war and the volunteer operations in those Territories, and we desired his report to be published, looking upon it as embodying the views of General Wool; and so ridiculous were its statements, and so gross its perversions, as to make it an easy task for friends of the people of those Territories to make its misrepresentations apparent. I will give one instance.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BLAIR. I think if the gentleman was so anxious to have the report of Captain Cram published, he took a very bad way of showing it by going into the Department to blacken that report. [Cries of "Order."]

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I submit the question of order that this discussion has nothing to do with the amendment reducing the sum from $5,000 to $2,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The discussion has only been indulged in by unanimous consent.

[Cries of "Question," "Question."]

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington. I simply want to make a single remark. I trust this appropriation will not be reduced; and whenever this whole question of the Columbia, the Indian tribes, and the volunteers, to which this river has such relations, comes up, I am ready to discuss it with facts and arguments which I believe will be convincing to all men.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

In line one hundred and fifty-three strike out the word "fifty," and insert "seventy five;" so as to make the clause read as follows:

For continuing the survey of the northern and northwestern lakes, including Lake Superior, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am also instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means, to offer the following amendment:

In line one hundred and fifty-four, strike out "five," and insert "ten;" so as to make the clause read:

For printing charts of lake surveys, $10,000.

Mr. HOWARD. I will state in regard to that amendment, that the original estimate was for $10,000 instead of $5,000, but for the purpose of diminishing the expenses as much as possible, the Committee of Ways and Means reduced it to $5,000. Since that we have learned that these charts are not published for general circulation, and that this amount is actually needed. The charts are for the use of vessels navigating these waters, and are used for no other purpose. They cannot get along without this amount.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

At the end of line one hundred and fifty-four, insert the following:

To enable the Secretary of War to employ temporary clerks in the office of the Quartermaster General, on bounty land surveys, $5,000.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

Insert at the end of line one hundred and fifty-four, the following:

For support of four companies of volunteers mustered into the service of the United States at Camp Scott, Utah Territory, in October, November, and December, of 1857, $173,478 70.

These four companies were enlisted by Colonel Johnston at Camp Scott for nine months. It is unnecessary that I should go into any explanation of the matter, unless some objection is made; and therefore I shall submit the amendment to the committee without further remark.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROW. I move to amend, by adding the following at the end of the bill:

Provided, That no part of the military force of the United States, for the support of which appropriations are made by this act, shall be employed in Kansas as a posse comitatus in aid of the enforcement of any law or constitution, or proposed law or constitution, in Kansas.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I rise to a question of order. That amendment changes the existing law, and is not in order in an appropriation bill.

Mr. GROW. It only proposes to limit the manner in which the appropriation shall be expended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment proposes to change existing law, and therefore decides it to be out of order.

Mr. GROW. I then offer it in this form:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended for the purpose, &c.

We have the right to provide the manner in which these appropriations shall be expended.

The CHAIRMAN. The manner of expending the appropriations contained in this bill are regulated by existing law; and the amendment proposing to change and control, or give direction as to the manner they are to be expended, changes existing law.

Mr. GROW. The Chair will remember, that during the last Congress, amendments precisely similar were held to be in order, and the decision of the Chair was twice sustained upon appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no particular recollection upon the subject. He has decided in the way he believes to be right. The President is bound to exercise the authority vested in him by law, and the gentleman's amendment is not in order here, for it proposes to change that law.

Mr. GROW. That is begging the question. I take an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment out of order because it changes existing law.

Mr. GROW. I demand tellers on the appeal. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON and UNDERWOOD were appointed.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes seventy-eight, noes not counted.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington. I offer the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That there be, and hereby is, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, whatever amount may be necessary to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to defray the expenses necessarily incurred by the territorial governments of Oregon and Washington in the suppression of Indian hostilities therein in the years 1855 and 1856, so far as the claims growing out of said war have been adjudicated by the commissioners appointed for that purpose, agreeably to the provisions of the eleventh section of the act of the 18th August, 1856, entitled "An act making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1857," and have been reported to the War Department, by said commissioners, for payment.

And be it further enacted, That the amounts severally found due to the parties contained in the report of the said commissioners shall be paid to the said parties respectively, or their legal representatives, or to the assignees or attorneys, duly constituted and appointed, of said parties, anything in the act approved July 29, 1846, or in the act of February, 1853, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. LETCHER. I raise a question of order on that amendment. My point is, that it is not in the nature of a regular appropriation, and therefore not in order to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

OCEAN MAIL STEAMERS.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the committee next proceed to the consideration of the mail-steamer appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

Mr. REAGAN objected.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I hope that that bill will not pass. There are certain revelations in relation to that ocean mail service which I desire to announce to the committee. I have no disposition to make war upon any of the heads of any of the Departments of this Government, yet I do think that it is time that Congress should take into its own hands more of the legislation of the country than they seem to have been in the habit of doing for some time past. For one, I stand upon this floor, having the right to exercise my privileges here independently, and without restraint or restriction. This whole question has been before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads during the present session of Congress, and although we have been in session for the last six months we have made no report to this House. So far as the expense is concerned, I can say that there is but one line or contract between New York and Europe, by virtue of any law with which I am familiar. A large part of that appropriation is intended to authorize the Postmaster General to contract with other companies to perform additional service, to commence in New York and to extend to certain points in Europe. The old contracts have expired, and during the last twelve months the service has been performed under contract with the Postmaster General, those taking the mails agreeing to take them for the postage accruing, as compensation. We are now informed that those contracts cannot be renewed on the same terms, and we are asked to authorize the Postmaster General to make contracts for carrying the mails from New York to certain points of Europe.

Now, I say it is not just to the different sections of this Union that this policy should be continued. It is not proper that New York should be allowed the privileges of three lines; to control the operations of the commerce of this country; to become the exclusive carrier of letters between the United States and Europe, to the exclusion of every other portion of the United States. It is this policy which has given to the city of New York advantages over our southern cities. It is this policy which deprives New Orleans—a city which exports three times as much as the city of New York—from competing with New York. It is this policy which deprives Charleston, Savannah, Philadelphia, and other points upon this continent, of the opportunity of competing fairly in the commercial operations of the country with New York. Subsidize a vessel that sails from New York to Europe, and of course a vessel cannot sail from Savannah, Philadelphia, or New Orleans, upon terms equally as advantageous.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I wish, in good faith, to offer an amendment to this bill, which I think is of very great importance; but inasmuch as points of order are frequently raised by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, when amendments are offered, I wish to inquire of him whether there is any existing law for that portion of the bill included in lines eleven and thirteen, inclusive, which I propose to strike out by my amendment?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will answer the gentleman that there is a law. The act of 1845 authorized the Postmaster General to make contracts to carry the mails, and the bill only appropriates money to carry out those contracts.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I understand that.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the gentleman will allow me a few minutes of his time, I will explain the whole matter; and I wish, in the same connection, to say a word in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS.] The estimates for the steam mail service were not sent to the Committee of Ways and Means until the 25th of April. The reason was, a desire upon the part of the Postmaster General and the Administration, that the whole system of mail service upon the ocean might be revised. One or two contracts have expired, and there is but one now subsisting, and that is with the Collins line. The Postmaster General has declined to renew each contract as it expired, in order that Congress might take up the system and revise it thoroughly. The Department waited until the 25th of April. I waited that long for the estimates. They were withheld on the ground of necessity. But Congress fixed the day of adjournment, and it came to the point that the responsibility of the suspension of this branch of the service had to fall either upon the executive branch of the Government or upon Congress. Having waited until that time, and seeing that Congress took no action in the way of revising the system, the Postmaster General felt it his duty to submit his estimates on a temporary basis—that is, for one year.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I rise to a question of personal privilege. It is said that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads had not reported. I endeavored to have action by that committee, and the reason why we did not act is, that we were constantly informed that it was the desire of the Postmaster General that we should not act. And delay after delay has been interposed to prevent action, until this bill has now been put in such a form as to include provisions working outrageous injustice to different sections of this Union. I trust that a sense of common justice to all sections of the Union will induce members to vote down this bill, until some system can be devised which shall do justice to every section of the Union.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have found no fault with the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, nor have I said that any one else has found fault with it. The fact I alleged was, that the Post Office Department did not send its estimates to the Committee of Ways and Means until the 25th of April. The reason of the delay assigned to me was, that they were waiting for Congress to take action on this subject. I make no issue, however, with the gentleman from Mississippi. I wish it to be distinctly understood that no plan has been submitted by the Postmaster General. I understand that my friend from Mississippi takes exception to the subsisting line from New York.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I say there is no contract with any other line.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I ask whether the appropriations in the bill are intended to carry out existing laws, or whether they do not authorize the Postmaster General to make new contracts?

Mr. SANDIDGE. I believe I am entitled to the floor. I yielded it to permit the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to answer the interrogatory which I propounded to him. I hope he will answer it, in order that I may have an opportunity of doing what I proposed to do.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I hope the gentleman from Louisiana will allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania to answer my question.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to do so.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I will do so if I do not lose my right to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will not lose his right unless objection be made.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman cannot lose anything. The debate is not terminated on the bill. I was coming to the point made in the interrogatory of the gentleman. The question of carrying on these mails is a mere question of responsibility. The law of 1855 authorizes the Postmaster General to make contracts. I have already said that he has made none except a temporary contract with the Havre line. That is consistent with the existing law, because the Postmaster General has authority to make said contracts. Congress not having taken charge of the system, he asks you either to appropriate the money for one year or else take the responsibility of suspending the lines. The only lines open are the Havre line and one to Panama. The contract for the latter line expired a year in advance of that on the Pacific side from Panama. Congress not having made any legislation for the continuance of the latter line, the Postmaster General proposes to you to give him means to carry it on for one year, or else take the responsibility of not doing so, so that it may be understood by the country that Congress means that all these lines shall be discontinued.

Now, if it be the pleasure of Congress that the mail service from Panama to San Francisco shall be discontinued, and also the line between New York and Havre, all that is necessary to be done is to strike out the appropriation, and the Postmaster General will not complain. The appropriation for the Collins line cannot of course be stricken out, for the contract has yet some time to run. If Congress fail to make the appropriations, I take it the lines will be immediately discontinued.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. This bill proposes to appropriate between six and seven hundred thousand dollars. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to state whether, within the last few days, the Postmaster General has not proceeded to make a contract with a company claiming to own the right of way across Tehuantepec, adding $290,000 to the annual expense of transporting the mails to California; and whether, before this Congress adjourns, an appropriation will not be asked for to carry out that contract—and that, too, at a time when the existing contract across Panama, and the overland contract between the Atlantic States and California, make the annual expense of the mail service between the Atlantic and Pacific $1,300,000? Under all these circumstances, I ask the House if it is not better to have this bill postponed until a general scheme can be prepared and adopted, taking from the Postmaster General the power to exercise this unlimited control over this important question?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. In the first place, I do not know that any such contract has been made. It never reached my ears before.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Well, I state that such a contract is in existence.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If there is, I have no knowledge of it; but I will give to the House the information I have got. The amendment proposed in this bill to be appropriated for the mail service to the Pacific coast is precisely the same as was appropriated last year. A question was raised as to the Tehuantepec route, spoken of by the gentleman from Mississippi, and the information I have, informally, is that the company agreed to take the mail across that route if there should be any sent there within the current year, without any cost whatever to the Government.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I state this: that according to the information which we have received from the Postmaster General, the contract is certainly made, and I suppose was signed to-day. By the terms of that contract, this new company is to receive the sum of $290,000 a year for taking the mails over the Tehuantepec route, and that, as I have said, at a time when there exists a contract for carrying them over the Panama route, for which the Government pays $700,000, and the overland route, for which the Government pays $600,000, making $1,300,000, in addition to the new contract that is now being made.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will answer my friend conclusively in one word. This bill provides not one cent for such a purpose. I tell the gentleman that I will go with him in not appropriating one single dollar for it. It is the first time I ever heard of it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. One word right there. The law gives authority to the Postmaster General to make contracts for the transportation of the mails across a foreign country, from one point in the United States to another. Tehuantepec is a foreign country; and therefore, under that law, he has authority to make the contract; and when the contract is made, then we shall be asked, will you repudiate a contract made by the Government?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The gentleman has two remedies; one is to repeal that law, and the other is to refuse to appropriate the money.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. If we refuse to appropriate the money now, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads will present a system, when they have time, and Congress can mature it, and then appropriate money accordingly.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Then, if I understand the gentleman from Mississippi, he proposes that Congress shall postpone this appropriation bill until they can legislate upon this whole subject. I will not take issue with my friend. If Congress would vote down this bill, and pass a law providing for the repeal of the act of 1845, and establish upon some system this whole subject of mail steam contracts, I would go with my friend from Mississippi; but I tell you you will not do it this session.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. We will try to do it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Well, if it is the pleasure of the committee to postpone this bill, the gentleman can make that motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I move that the bill be laid aside for the present.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Not now; I am not through yet. I wish to make a few more remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I yield to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have but one or two more remarks to make, and that is all I shall have to say, except in answer to questions. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi to the amounts appropriated in this bill. The gentleman speaks of the sum total of the bill. A portion of the appropriations are the proceeds of the mail service. The money is not to come out of the Treasury without any returns. This item of $230,000 for the transportation of the mails from New York to Havre and Bremen is the estimated amount of revenue accruing from that service.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. If the gentleman will permit, I will put the matter in such a shape that he cannot dodge it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I cannot yield now. The gentleman can answer me when I am through. The contract with the Havre and Bremen line was made for ten years, for the sum of $350,000 per annum. That contract expired one year ago. Congress made no appropriation for its continuance. The question came up before the Postmaster General as to what was to be done with the line of mail steamers. He had no appropriation, and consequently made no contract; but he stipulated with them that they should carry the mails for the postages, not taking one cent out of the Treasury.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. That is the Liverpool line.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. That is the line from New York to Havre and Bremen, via Southampton. After this temporary arrangement was made, the proprietors of that line said that the sum of $230,000—which was estimated to be the amount of revenue accruing from the mail service—was too little; but that they would agree to continue the service until Congress met, and that they would look to Congress to make some new arrangement. It is on these terms and conditions that the mails have been carried. Congress has done nothing in the premises, up to this time. Now the Postmaster General simply says to you: either appropriate the money, or alter the law, and abolish the line. Congress have neither abolished the line nor have they appropriated the money thus far. You must either take the responsibility of abolishing the line, or appropriate the money. Upon this point the Postmaster General has no feeling at all.

I wish to add this: I have not a shadow of doubt—indeed I am authorized to say—that the Administration desires Congress to take up this whole subject of mail-steamer service, and put it upon a self-supporting basis. The feeling of the Administration is, that it should be self-supporting. It is their desire to make no contract, in any event, beyond the amount of postages, until Congress does act. The appropriation contained in this bill is to continue the service for one year, or until the next meeting of Congress, with a view to the whole system being revised by Congress. This is a mere temporary arrangement for one year.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I wish to make myself distinctly understood in reference to one or two points. The Postmaster General, in his annual report to Congress, reported his action in reference to these three lines. There was an existing contract with one of them; and he had made a contract with the parties owning the other two lines, to transport the mails for the postages until this session of Congress—that is, for one year. There is, then, no recommendation in the report—no statement that he will not be able to continue the contracts for a number of years. The matter was referred by the House to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania says that the committee has not acted. Why has not the committee acted? I say, sir, it is not the fault of the committee that there has been no action up to this time. The gentleman says that the Postmaster General has desired that the committee should act. That was not our information. Our information was that it was desired the committee should not act, but that the whole matter should go over until the next session, so as to give the Postmaster General an opportunity of presenting an ocean mail steamer system.

Now, the House also referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads the question of the propriety of letting a contract to the company applying for a contract to transport the mails from the Atlantic to the Pacific, over the Tehuantepec route. That question is now under consideration before the committee; but without any notice to the committee, the Postmaster General has himself proceeded to make a contract with some company—who it is I do not know.

I hope, sir, this House is not prepared at this time to authorize a contract involving the additional amount of $290,000 to be imposed upon the Treasury in its present condition. Efforts have been made by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to take action upon the subject, but the response has universally been, the Postmaster General does not want action now; that he desires to present a plan of his own.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I presume, after this, no gentleman in this House will complain that I have not been sufficiently accommodating. I wished to ascertain of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means the fact that there was no law authorizing the use of the money to be appropriated by the tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth lines of the section under consideration. In this bill, the Committee of Ways and Means propose to appropriate about seven hundred thousand dollars in money for the transportation of mails across the ocean to Europe. Now, sir, I do not, in the amendment I shall offer, propose to interfere in the least with the existing or proposed arrangements for the transportation of the mails to Panama and California, nor between New York and Europe. If my amendment shall meet the concurrence of the committee, I will make no opposition to the amount of money asked by the bill; but inasmuch as the Committee of Ways and Means have, on the suggestion of the Postmaster General, reported an appropriation of $696,000 to carry the mail in ocean steamships to Europe, I shall offer an amendment which proposes to exceed that sum only by about fifteen or sixteen thousand dollars, and which provides, not only for the same mail service from New York, but also for establishing a line of mail steamers between New Orleans and Bordeaux, via Havana, Bermuda, Fayal, and Santander.

We hold, in Louisiana, that if the Government is to engage in subsidizing steamship companies to enable them to run their vessels in competition with foreign steamers, the great interests of the Mississippi valley, and of the whole southwest, have some claims upon the consideration of this House.

Now, sir, the sum I propose, as I have stated, exceeds only by about fifteen thousand dollars that which is asked for by this bill, and it secures not only the same service from New York, as provided for by the committee, but also the additional line of steamers which I have mentioned.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The reason why this appropriation was submitted to the House by the Committee of Ways and Means, was that it was the only practicable form of getting it before Congress. There is no contract made to carry the mail from New York to Havre, Bremen, Panama, or San Francisco, and Congress having had no legislation on the subject, the only practicable mode of getting it before Congress was to estimate what it would cost. If Congress strikes it out, then Congress discontinues the line; if Congress puts it in, then the Postmaster General will make the contract for one year according to the appropriation.

Now, if the gentleman wishes to make two lines, and simply moves to increase the appropriation, the Postmaster General may infer, that you intend to authorize the Havre and Bremen line for one year longer at augmented rates. If the gentleman wishes to establish an additional line, he must designate in his amendment precisely what service he proposes.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I am very glad the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has indicated to me the form in which I should offer my amendment, and that it will be in order. Now, sir, I can show to this committee that, by the adoption of the amendment which I propose, we shall not only continue all the trips secured by the old lines, but will have forty-eight trips per annum, at an aggregate cost of $664,000; whereas by the bill, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, you secure only forty-two trips, at a cost of $696,500, making a difference of $32,500. Now, sir, I can imagine no reason why this committee shall refuse to accept the amendment I now send to the Clerk's table. I propose to strike out all after the word "dollars," in the ninth line, to the end of the fourteenth line, as follows:

"And it is hereby provided that there be paid to the Post Office Department out of said appropriation such sums as may be required to procure the transportation of the mails from New York and Liverpool, and back, on such days as the Collins line may fail to take them from New York;"

And to insert the following:

Provided, That the existing contract with E. K. Collins and his associates shall be deemed abandoned and forfeited, unless the service thereof shall be resumed on or before the 30th day of June, 1858.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following routes shall be ocean post routes: Route No. 1. From New York to Liverpool and back. Route No. 2. From New York to Havre, via Southampton, and back. Route No. 3. From New York to Gluckstadt, via Plymouth, Havre, and Rotterdam, and back. Route No. 4. From New Orleans to Bordeaux, via Havana, Bermuda, Fayal, and Santander, and back. Provided, That the rate per statute mile to be paid for transporting the mails of the United States on the above designated post routes shall not exceed the sum of two dollars; and that there shall be a semi-monthly service on route No. 1, and a monthly service on each of the routes No. 2, No. 3, and No. 4; and the service on routes No. 1 and No. 2 shall begin as soon after June 30, 1858, as possible; and the service on routes No. 3 and No. 4 shall begin on or about the first day of December, 1858.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, immediately after the passage of this act, to contract with citizens of the United States to transport the mails of the United States on the above designated routes, at an average rate of speed during the year of ten miles an hour, in steamships built in the United States, for a period of ten years, and thenceforward until after twelve months' notice of termination shall have been given, after advertising for proposals for the same, during a period of thirty days: Provided, That the Postmaster General shall not be compelled to accept the lowest bid, and that the steamships to be employed on routes No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, shall be of not less than two thousand tons burden, Government register; and that the steamships employed on route No. 4 shall be of not less than fifteen hundred tons burden, Government register: Provided, That the service on route No. 1 shall not begin until the expiration, by limitation, abandonment, or forfeiture, of the present contract of E. K. Collins and his associates, and that in each and every contract made under this act there shall be a stipulation that a fine of $2,000 shall be imposed by the Postmaster General for a delay of twelve hours after the appointed time of departure, and for each additional twelve hours' delay an additional fine of $2,000 shall be imposed; and if the delay shall extend to two days, then one half of the contract pay for the round trip shall be deducted, unless the cause of such delay be shown in each case, to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General, to have been beyond the control of the contracting parties, or their agents, or employees; and if the contracting parties shall fail to provide a suitable steamship within three days after the time fixed for the departure of the mails, a fine, equal in amount to double the contract pay for a round trip, shall be imposed upon the contracting parties; and should the contracting parties fail to perform their total annual service at an average rate of speed of ten miles an hour, then, for every twelve hours' excess, the contracting parties shall forfeit $2,000, it being understood that all fines and forfeitures provided for in this section shall be made by the Postmaster General according to his discretion: Provided further, That the contractors on each and all of the above designated routes shall carry, free of expense, when so directed by the Postmaster General, mail agents, bearers of United States Government dispatches, and all books, maps, charts, and instruments for mathematical and scientific purposes imported for the use of the United States Government; and that the Government of the United States shall have the power to increase the number of trips on any and all of the above-designated routes, upon giving one year's notice to the contractors thereon, at the same rate of compensation for the increased service; and that the Government of the United States shall have the right to demand and appropriate to its own use, at any time, any and all of the steamships used in said mail service, at a price to be fixed by the Secretary of the Navy and the contractors owning, or using in the service, the steamships so appropriated by the Government.

Mr. ENGLISH. I rise to a question of order on that amendment, and I want the Chair to decide it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I raise the point whether that amendment can be entertained as an amendment to an appropriation bill. There is no law for it; but, on the contrary, it provides for new contracts and new liabilities.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the first part of the amendment, which proposes to change the existing law, is not in order. The latter part of the amendment, consisting of various sections, the Chair understands to be for the establishment of new lines not now provided for by law. The Chair understands that some of the provisions in this bill are for the establishment of lines not authorized by law. If the Chair is correct in that conclusion, it may be that that portion of the amendment will be in order, offered at the proper place.

Mr. SEWARD. If the amendment, as now offered, is out of order, I say let it be so ruled, and let us go on.

Mr. KELSEY. Cannot the amendment be divided, and the question taken on the branches of it separately?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the first branch out of order. He understands that the service on that route is regulated by the contract made with the Collins line in pursuance of law. The amendment proposes to establish new terms and new conditions, on which the contract shall continue or become forfeited. That portion which does that, the Chair rules out of order.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I should like to say a word. The amendment does not propose to change the contract existing between E. K. Collins and the Government, if, indeed, there be any such contract at this time, for he has not carried the mail since last December. The committee's bill has been framed to meet and provide for continued failures, the Postmaster General being authorized to use the same amount heretofore paid to the Collins line in the employment of substitute steamers whenever they can be had.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I should like to have read the portion of the amendment decided to be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the point of order of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I hope that I will not be interrupted. I should like to understand what portion of my amendment is ruled out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. If the amendment is offered as it is, the Chair will rule it all out of order. The Chair regards the first branch out of order, without deciding whether the latter branch is or not.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I withdraw the first branch of the amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I raise the question of order on the balance of the proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If this bill provided only to carry out existing laws, the Chair would rule the amendment out of order; but the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has stated that there is no law authorizing two or three of the routes embraced in this bill. Therefore, the Chair cannot undertake to rule out an amendment, upon the ground that it is not authorized by existing law, when there are provisions of that description in the bill itself.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I hope that I will be allowed to proceed with my remarks. I am sure it will be agreed on all hands that when we pay the large sum that we do for the transportation of the United States mail on the ocean, the representatives of the people should have something to say in the matter. If we are to have mail steamer lines we should direct between what ports in the United States and Europe the communication is to be contracted for. We ought to fix the compensation, and not leave the whole matter to the Postmaster General, however much confidence may be reposed in him.

This bill proposes to give $350,000 for carrying on a service to be contracted for by the Postmaster General. Are you willing to vote that sum to sustain lines which you will not yourself establish? If you are not, I ask that you strike that sum from the bill. If you wish steamship lines to Europe, say to what ports they shall run. Is that unreasonable? Are you willing to abdicate your own prerogative, and to turn this whole matter over to the Postmaster General? If you are, then vote for this bill as it comes from the Committee of Ways and Means. The bill provides that the Postmaster General may expend this money as he pleases. I do not arraign the Committee of Ways and Means.

But, sir, when members shall think that the condition of the Treasury will allow an expenditure of $700,000 for transporting the mails to Europe, I think they may as well decide upon what lines the mails shall be carried. I do not wish to interfere with the three lines running from New York to Europe; I wish them continued, but on condition that we who live in the valley of the Mississippi shall also have a line running from New Orleans, the first exporting city in the Union. The amendment I propose, establishes our ocean mail service to Europe on the same basis as the land service. It provides for forty-eight trips for the next fiscal year, at a saving of $32,132 upon the estimates and amount appropriated in this bill for forty-two trips. The price of two dollars per mile is fixed as a maximum, so as to bring the expenses within the estimated receipts. The size of the steamers, two thousand tons, and the speed of ten miles an hour, are considered the most advantageous, and I have in my hand certificates to that effect from a chief engineer of the United States Navy. There are two foreign steamers a week, and sometimes three, leaving New York, whereas there is not one American steamer a week to Europe. Two thirds of the valuable goods are brought in steamers. In 1840 only $600,000 worth of goods were imported into Boston in foreign vessels, but last year $17,000,000 in value were imported there, two thirds of which came in the Cunard steamers, making two trips a month. The less ocean mail service to Europe the United States does, the more it costs us, because by our postal treaties we collect free of cost all the postages due to foreign Governments, but we pay forty-two and one half per cent. on unpaid letters on their collections to United States postmasters, and if all the letters go by foreign mail steamers, the postages average $1,200,000 a year, and the United States would lose about thirty per cent. on that amount, being paid as commissions to postmasters, or about three hundred and sixty thousand dollars a year. If we abolish postal treaties, then foreign Governments will do as they did before, double the postage.

Now, with the lines proposed by this amendment, we will secure an efficient ocean mail service on general principles, and without any cost to the United States for transportation. The postages received, taking the amount of 1855, would leave a deficit of only $110,000; but then we had but fifty-two trips—we now propose sixty trips; and the estimated receipts will cover all the transportation expenses. We had better do nothing than to pay out $700,000 for an irregular and necessarily inefficient service. We must have regularity and punctuality, otherwise the bulk of the letters will be carried by the foreign lines, which do run with great regularity.

The contracts made last year for the Bremen mails, and Havre mails, have been failures. The contractor on the Bremen route did not perform his trips in the winter months, although he had two steamers lying at the dock; and the contractor on the Havre line did perform his trips, but he has applied to Congress for extra pay over and above his contract, which was for the postages. If this $696,500 is to be appropriated for the European mails, I say Congress should direct how it is to be used. I did desire, Mr. Chairman, if the hour were not so late, to say something in explanation of every item in the amendment which I have offered; but as its main features can be easily understood, I will not consume more of the time of the committee, but ask a vote upon it.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to amend the second paragraph of the bill by—

Mr. ENGLISH. I desire to know what has become of the question of order which was raised.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decided the question of order, and there being no appeal taken, the amendment was received.

Mr. ENGLISH. I have a right to raise a question of order now?

Mr. SEWARD. Not while I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understood that the question of order was in abeyance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that he was deciding the question of order. If there is no objection upon the part of the committee the Chair will allow the question again to be presented.

Mr. SEWARD. Not while I am entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to the floor unless a point of order is raised.

Mr. SEWARD. Gentlemen cannot go behind my right and raise a question of order.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Is it understood that the question of order which was presented and decided, can be presented again?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to present it at this time. The Chair decided it, and no appeal was taken.

Mr. ENGLISH. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understood the Chair to say that if there was a provision in this bill for a new line and the proposition of the gentleman from New York was offered as an amendment to that, then that he would hold it to be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair said that the gentleman from Pennsylvania in discussing the bill, stated that two or three lines were not authorized by law, and in that view of the case the Chair ruled the amendment in order.

Mr. ENGLISH. I took an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that these lines were not under contract; and not that there was no law to authorize them.

Mr. SICKLES. That was the point I wished to make, and rose for the purpose of presenting it to the Chair; supposing that the question of order was in abeyance all this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated the decision more than once.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If I made any such statement as the Chair has referred to, I correct it now. I stated that there was no contract; and not that there was no law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire if there is any law authorizing lines of steamers? If there is any law authorizing them, the appropriation is properly within the bill, and the amendment would not be in order; but the Chair understood the gentleman to say that there was no law, and that this was an estimate made by the Postmaster General for the approval of Congress, and not operative unless there was a law passed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am sorry that the Chair should so have misunderstood me, and I desire to correct that misunderstanding now. I meant to state that there was a law of 1845 which authorized the Postmaster General to make contracts generally for this kind of service; that the contracts, except that with the Collins line, have expired; that there is no contract, for this Havre and Bremen line, but that the Postmaster General is authorized by law to make a contract; that he has made a temporary contract to carry the mails for the proceeds of the postage; that that contract is in existence, but that if Congress appropriates this amount he will make a contract for the amount appropriated by Congress. There is a law authorizing the Postmaster General to make a contract, but there is no contract for that service except a temporary one.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to know the exact state of facts.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The line from New York to Havre and Bremen is now under temporary contract.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair now understands the gentleman to say that there is a law existing authorizing the service upon these various lines.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. There is no law designating any line.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no law designating any line, the Chair cannot draw a distinction between a line in the amendment and a line contained in the bill.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. There is a law establishing the line between New York and Liverpool, for the law directed a contract to be made with Collins & Company. Furthermore, in relation to the line from New York to Havre and Bremen, the contract was made on proposals invited by the act of 1845, which were submitted by the Postmaster General to Congress for its approval. Therefore, the line is provided for by Congress. I say, therefore, that there is a law establishing a line between New York and Havre and Bremen.

So far as the other contracts are concerned—from New York to Aspinwall or Chagres—the contract has not expired. The contract, in that instance, was made in pursuance of law, authorizing a contract to be made with A. G. Sloo. The same is true of the line from Panama to San Francisco. Mail service was contracted to be performed from New York, by the way of Panama, to San Francisco, and there is an act upon the statute-book establishing that as a mail route.

I then say, in reference to the routes proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Louisiana, that his amendment proposes to establish new mail routes not authorized by existing law, and therefore it is not in order.

Mr. SANDIDGE. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is perfectly correct in his statement.

Mr. SEWARD. I propose to refer the legal question to the Court of Claims. [Laughter.]

Mr. SANDIDGE. I wish to discuss the question of order. There is a general law which authorizes the Postmaster General to establish mail lines, on land or ocean, wherever he pleases; but as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means says, there are no present contracts to have the mails carried on two of the lines from New York to Europe for any definite period at all. There is merely a temporary arrangement that those lines shall carry the mails at so much a trip. If that is a contract under the law to which the gentleman refers, then there is a contract; but the law which authorizes the Postmaster General to establish lines to Bremen and Havre, equally authorizes the establishment of a line from New Orleans to Bordeaux.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Now, we will settle the question whether there is any law on the subject, as asserted by the gentleman from Missouri. Here is the law of last session:

"That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, for the year ending 30th June, 1858:

"For transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool and back, $346,500.

"For transportation of the mails from New York to New Orleans, Charleston, Savannah, Havana, and Chagres, and back, $261,000.

"For transportation of the mails from Panama to California, and Oregon, and back, $328,350.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending 30th June, 1858, out of any money in the Treasury arising out of the revenue of said Department, in conformity to the act of 2d of January, 1836.

"For transportation of the mails between Charleston and Havana, a sum not exceeding fifty thousand dollars.

"For transportation of the mails across the Isthmus of Panama, $135,000."

Now, I admit that, so far as the first section of this bill is concerned, it is all right, and in accordance with law; but this which is embraced artfully and ingeniously in the second and third sections, is intended to confer authority upon the Postmaster General, or rather to give him the means to make a new contract now unknown to law, and having no legal authority or existence. I admit that there are contracts for the service from New York to Chagres, and from New York to Liverpool. Those are provided for in the first section. But the three hundred odd thousand dollars is unauthorized by law, and is intended to enable the Postmaster General to establish two new contracts from New York to different points in Europe.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. By the act of 1847 the Secretary of the Navy was directed to accept the proposal of E. K. Collins; and he was also directed to contract on the part of the Government of the United States with A. G. Sloo, of Cincinnati, for the transportation of the United States mails from New York to New Orleans and Chagres, twice a month and back, touching at Charleston, Savannah, and Havana. By the same act the Secretary of the Navy was directed to make a contract for the transportation of the mails from Panama to such point as he might select in the Territory of Oregon, once a month each way.

Now, the lines provided for in this bill have all been established by law. I have referred to the act by which the contracts were directed to be made. In two instances the parties are specified in the act of Congress. In the third instance—the line from Panama to San Francisco, and thence to Oregon—the Department was directed to make a contract, which was subsequently made with Arnold Harris, in pursuance of proposals received under advertisement, issued in accordance with the provisions of the act of 1847.

With reference to the Bremen and Havre lines, as I remarked before, under the act of 1845, the then Postmaster General, Cave Johnson, invited proposals for the transportation of the mails to different ports in Europe. He reported to Congress at the first session of the Twenty-Ninth Congress, that he had received proposals from the company afterwards organized as the Ocean Steam Navigation Company; and the line was established, running from New York to Bremen and Havre. The act of 1845 expressly recognizes those lines, and appropriates money in pursuance of the contracts which the Postmaster General had made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the gentleman whether there is, as was stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Louisiana, a general law authorizing the Postmaster General to make contracts for this manner of service wherever he pleases?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. That depends upon the construction of the act.

Mr. CLEMENS. I have the law here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair also desires to know whether the service embraced in this bill is authorized by existing law?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. In response to the inquiry first propounded to me, I will say, that as I understand the law, the Postmaster General may receive proposals for mail service under the act of 1845, but no contract is to take effect until it shall have been submitted to Congress for its ratification. That is my construction of the act of 1845. I will say further, in response to the Chair, that this bill proposes to appropriate nothing except for routes which have been established by law.

Mr. WATKINS. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one question of order already pending.

Mr. WATKINS. Well, I want to ask a question of the Chair. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee, if it be in order for the gentleman from Louisiana to yield the floor to the gentleman from Missouri, and the gentleman from Georgia, and the gentleman from Indiana, would it not be equally in order for him to yield the floor to me to give notice of an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would.

Mr. WATKINS. Then I ask to have my amendment read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That it is equally obligatory upon the Government to hold foreign Governments to a just responsibility for firing into American vessels, as it is to authorize American vessels to arrest the citizens of other countries upon their own soil.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman of the committee which reported the bill as stating that there is a general law—

Mr. CLEMENS. At that point I desire to make a suggestion to the Chair. There is no existing law authorizing these appropriations. I have before me the act of 1845, to which allusion has been made by the gentleman from Louisiana and the gentleman from Missouri; and I desire to call the attention of the committee to a section of that act. The following is the law:

"That the Postmaster General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, under the restrictions and provisions of the existing laws, to contract for the transportation of the United States mail between any of the ports of the United States, and a port or ports of any foreign Power, whenever, in his opinion, the public interest will thereby be promoted; and it shall be his duty to report to the next ensuing Congress a copy of each of said contracts, with a statement of the amount of postage derived under the same as far as the returns of the Department will enable him to do so. And such contracts may be made if it shall appear to the Postmaster General to be required by the public interest for any greater period than four years, and not exceeding ten years. All such contracts shall be made with citizens of the United States, and the mail to be transported in American vessels by American citizens. Each contract entered into under the provisions of this act, besides the usual stipulations of the right of the Postmaster General to discontinue the same, shall contain the further stipulation, that it may, at any time, be terminated by a joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress."

These are the provisions of the act of 1845. That act, as I understand it, has now expired.

Mr. GROW. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing this debate.

Mr. SEWARD. I have the floor, I believe, but I shall not trouble the committee long, and, if the object is to close debate, I have no objection to yielding the floor now.

Mr. GARNETT. I suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Grow,] has no right to take the floor from the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SEWARD.]

Mr. GROW. The gentleman from Georgia has yielded the floor.

Mr. GARNETT. Then I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania not to move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this bill. There are important amendments to be offered—amendments which should be made.

turely considered—and anxious, as I am, to adjourn on the 7th of June, I do not want to adjourn at that time if it is to be done by legislating in such hot haste.

Mr. SEWARD. I think I had better say what I have to say now, and I shall not trouble the committee long. I only want gentlemen to understand what the facts are, then I will yield the floor: In 1845 an act was passed authorizing these contracts to be entered into for the space of ten years. They have now expired by their own limitation, as I understand it. In 1857 an appropriation was made continuing this service for one year.

Mr. ENGLISH. I dislike to interrupt the gentlemen from Georgia, but I should like to know what has become of my question of order? I distinctly took an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I want that appeal decided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided, on the statement of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the amendment is in order.

Mr. ENGLISH. I take an appeal from that decision. I desire to say a word upon that appeal.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the gentleman's appeal will be entered. He cannot take the floor from me to discuss it.

Mr. ENGLISH. Then I shall insist that the gentleman from Georgia confine himself to that appeal.

Mr. SEWARD. I had the floor before the appeal was taken. I was going on to say that these contracts authorized by the act of 1845 have expired; in other words, the law has become inoperative by its own limitation, and that the appropriation made in 1857, was only to continue this service for one year. Then, whenever the twelve months are out these contracts cease, and the only law under which they can be continued, is the general law establishing the routes. It requires new legislation to continue them further. The Postmaster General, in his report, says:

"The Bremen and Havre lines having, under the sanction of Congress, been in operation ten years, affording direct communication between the United States and the continent of Europe, and it not appearing, by its action at the last session, that it was the intention of Congress that they should be discontinued on the expiration of the contract, I deemed it my duty to make provision for their continuance another year."

So that the Postmaster General recognizes these contracts as having expired; but, on account of the importance of these lines, as Congress has intimated no purpose to discontinue them, he has thought proper to continue them for one year—trusting that in the mean time Congress will take some action upon the subject. Now, sir, I move to amend this bill in the eleventh line, by inserting after the word "Liverpool" the words "or Southampton."

Mr. ENGLISH. I thought the question was upon the appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the amendment to be in order. From this decision the gentleman from Indiana takes an appeal.

Mr. ENGLISH. I desire to say simply one word. What I have to say is this: I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Phelps] has shown that the appropriations asked for in this bill are based upon existing laws; but whether that be so or not, I conceive, has nothing to do with the question of order before the committee. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Sandridge] offered an amendment proposing to establish a line of steamers, which is not authorized by any existing law. The 81st rule provides that no amendment shall be offered for any expenditure not previously authorized by law; and the question in reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana is, whether it conflicts with this rule? I say that the question whether the original provisions in the bill offered by the Committee of Ways and Means are in order, has nothing to do with it. Admitting that there may be appropriations in this bill not authorized by existing law, they do not make the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana in order. Not at all. Each amendment that is proposed must stand upon its own merits. I am not speaking at all upon the point as to whether the appropriations in this bill are based upon existing laws or not. That has nothing to do with the question. I submit that the amendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Now, sir, I admit that all that is contained in the first section of this bill is in accordance with law, and that the appropriation ought to be made, for the reason that contracts now exist between the Government and the parties who are to carry the mail. But this bill, in its subsequent sections, provides for the establishment of two new lines. I now speak of the following provisions:

"For transportation of the mails from New York, by Southampton or Cowes, to Bremen, and from New York, by Southampton or Cowes, to Havre, $230,000.

"For contingencies in the mail service between New York and Europe, $120,000."

Now, I call the attention of the committee to the fact that this mail service provided for is between New York and Europe; it does not say between New York and Liverpool, or designate any particular point. So that, for the two new lines, for which there is no contract between the Government and anybody whatever, there is appropriated the sum of $400,000, to be used by the Postmaster General as he pleases. I object to that; and I think that, therefore, the bill ought not to pass. I am willing to leave in existence the contracts for lines for which we are authorized to make appropriations, but I do object to appropriating $400,000 to be given to the Postmaster General to make contracts with whom he pleases.

I say that if new lines are to be started, one, at least, should start from some point south. All of them should not run to New York. If one be given to New Orleans, to touch at Charleston and Savannah, I am willing that New York, too, shall have the benefit of a new line. I ask whether it is just to make new lines for New York, which already has so many, and leave the rest of the Union unprovided with ocean mail facilities. What I wish is, that either those lines be stricken out, or that the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana be agreed to. It simply provides that the two lines contemplated by this bill shall be divided—one to go to New York, and the other to New Orleans; and it provides such restrictions and limitations as will compel the parties to perform their contract.

Mr. COLFAX. I move that the committee rise in order to close this debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would much prefer first to have the pending question of order disposed of.

Mr. COLFAX. I object. We have had the point of order pending for nearly two hours. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. SEWARD. I have the floor, and it cannot be taken from me by that motion.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. SEWARD. Before the report of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is received, I wish to make a statement. I had the floor assigned to me in committee, but yielded it for the decision of a point of order. Without respecting my rights, the Chairman allowed a motion to be made and put that the committee rise. There must be some rule enforced here, and some respect for the rights of members, or we can never get along. I object to the reception of the report of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union until this question is disposed of. I make that point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia. The Chair can have no knowledge of what transpires in committee, except through the report of the Chairman made to the House. Nothing is in order until that report is made.

Mr. SEWARD. I am a member of the committee, and my statement to the Chair is as truthful as any that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] can present. I leave it to the House to say whether I am not right.

Mr. HOUSTON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly certain appropriation bills; and had directed him to report to the House the Army appropriation bill without amendment, and the Post Office appropriation bill with amendment; also, that the committee had the ocean mail appropriation bill under consideration, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that debate on the ocean mail appropriation bill close within five minutes after its consideration in committee shall be again resumed.

Mr. BOCK. I move that the House adjourn; and on that motion I call for tellers.

Mr. SICKLES. If the House adjourns now, will not the bills which have been reported go to the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. They will.

Mr. DOWDELL. I ask that by unanimous consent the previous question shall be called on those bills.

Mr. SEWARD. I object. We must have some honesty and decency in legislation. I do not allude to my friend from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not know how the Chair decides that I am out of order.

The SPEAKER. There is no debatable question before the House.

Mr. SEWARD. I have simply objected to the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend until the question is put.

Mr. SEWARD. I know my rights. The rule imposes the same restriction on the Chair that it does on me. The Chair is just as apt to be out of order as I am.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear no suggestion until order is restored in the Hall.

Mr. SEWARD. Very well; I am always willing to do what is right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the Chair intimate how I will be in order?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will take his seat, he will be in order.

Mr. SEWARD. I will take my seat.

Mr. BOCK. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I desire, before the motion is made to close debate on the pending bill in the committee, to move the previous question upon the two bills which have just been reported to the House by the committee, that the main question may be ordered, so that they may not go to the Speaker's table, but may come up before the House to-morrow morning if we adjourn before disposing of them this evening. After that is done, I will, by unanimous consent, allow them to go over for the present, and move to go into committee again.

Mr. SEWARD. If my objection will arrest it, I object, whether in order or out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and to the House, if they desire to go back again into committee, that the object could be accomplished by moving to recommit the bills to the Committee of Ways and Means, and demanding the previous question, and without taking the vote on the previous question, then a motion to suspend the rules could be entertained.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to adopt the mode which will effect my object. I accept the suggestion of the Chair, and make that motion.

Mr. BOCK. I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion, and allow debate to close before we adjourn.

Mr. BOCK. I prefer to do that to-morrow.

Mr. DEWART demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Roccock and Berrinton were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 75.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Before the motion to go into committee is put, I move that all debate upon the pending bill in committee be closed within five minutes after the committee shall again resume its consideration.

Mr. SEWARD. I had the floor when the committee rose, and I made a statement to the Chair which was the truth, and which the whole committee knows is the truth; and now it is proposed to close debate in accordance with what I do not consider very proper action upon the part of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to extend the time of debate, that the gentleman from Georgia may have an opportunity to finish his speech. But if the gentleman from Georgia intends to insinuate that I entered into any arrangement, I say it is wholly without foundation in point of fact.

Mr. SEWARD. I did not say that the gentleman made any arrangement, but that I thought the action of the Chairman was improper.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must arrest this debate.

Mr. SICKLES. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "five," and inserting "fifteen."

Mr. BURNETT. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "fifteen," and inserting "thirty."

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I move the previous question upon the resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the House do now adjourn; and ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House refused to adjourn.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question recurring upon the amendment to the amendment to strike out "fifteen," and insert "thirty."

Mr. SEWARD said: I want but a few minutes. All I want is to have my right recognized. I am willing to put up with five minutes if my right is admitted.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I think five minutes is enough. The gentleman has occupied enough of the time of this House.

Mr. BURNETT. After the statement of the gentleman from Georgia, I will, by unanimous consent, withdraw my amendment to limit the debate to thirty minutes.

Mr. SICKLES. And I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. There is an appeal pending, and I hope I shall be allowed the five minutes myself. [Cries of "Oh, yes!"]

Mr. BOCKOCK, (at half past seven o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I desire to appeal to my friend who made that motion to withdraw it. The Opposition side of the House has evinced a disposition to aid us in getting through the appropriation bills, and it seems that our own friends are now throwing obstacles in the way of getting through the business.

Mr. PHILLIPS called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to.

The motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Houston in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the OCEAN MAIL STEAMER BILL.

Mr. ENGLISH. For the purpose of giving my friend from Georgia an opportunity to enter into the general debate, I withdraw my point of order for the time being; but intend to renew it.

Mr. SEWARD. I offer the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be authorized to contract for the transportation of the mails from Savannah, Georgia, to Havana, Island of Cuba, at such compensation as he may think reasonable and just, not exceeding $100,000.

Mr. Chairman, the contract entered into with E. K. Collins & Company has failed; and the legislation sought to be carried out in this bill is to allow the Postmaster General to enter into a contract with other parties for performing similar services, which is equivalent to making a new law on the subject. Southampton is, I think, seventy-one miles southwest of London, and most of the mail matter coming to this country comes through that port. The British Government has been managing their steamers so as to give them the carrying of all the mail matter, and so as to put the Government of the United States under great disadvantages. I propose my amendment as an additional section. Like the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Davis,] I am willing to sustain the present line of steamers if the South can be allowed to have equal benefits with the North in the appropriation of public money for mail communication with foreign countries. My amendment provides for the carrying of the mails between Savannah, Georgia, and Havana, in the Island of Cuba, authorizing the Postmaster General to enter into a contract not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars for that purpose. We accommodate gentlemen from the North with lines of steamers from their cities; and if the South can be privileged in the same way, we will have a sort of union movement, North and South, East and West. I hope that, to carry out these views, my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ENGLISH. I now renew the point of order which I made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. SANDIDGE.] The Chair overrules the point of order. From that decision the gentleman from Indiana appeals. Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken; and the decision was overruled.

The question was taken on Mr. SEWARD's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out all of the bill after line seven, first section. There are in this bill, as I understand it, three provisions for mails to foreign countries—one from New York to Liverpool, one from New York to Havre and Bremen, and one from Charleston to Havana. All the other provisions of the bill are for our own domestic mail from New York, by New Orleans and Havana, to Chagres, across the isthmus, and then up the coast on the other side. The line to Liverpool, and that from Charleston to Havana, are the only ones to foreign countries now authorized by law. The law of 1845, which has been referred to here, does not authorize the Postmaster General to make contracts, but to receive proposals, and submit them to Congress to be ratified and confirmed by Congress. I consider, sir, that under that law the Postmaster General has no authority to make any contract for the carrying of mails to any foreign country. If he has, why is it proposed now that Congress shall establish a route from New York to Havre and Bremen at $230,000?

Then, here is another item to which I would call the attention of this committee, and of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means:

"For contingencies of the mail service between New York and Europe, $120,000."

Where is the law that authorizes that? Where is the estimate that authorizes it? In my opinion—and I believe I speak with a knowledge of the subject—this is the first time that an item of that character has ever been in any of these foreign mail-service bills. When you add that $120,000 contingency to the $230,000, it makes $350,000—the precise amount, I believe, that was heretofore paid, under contract, to the Bremen and Havre line. Does the Postmaster General consider that he has authority, under the act of 1845, to make another contract? I presume he does not; and I do not consider that he has even the power to receive proposals.

We have been told that he has made a temporary contract for the postages. Has that come before us for confirmation or ratification? My own opinion is, that these two provisions for the transportation of the mails from New York to Bremen and Havre were not in order when reported in this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee. I believe no practical good is to be derived from any discussion here this evening; and I desire to get the bill into the House where a vote may be taken upon it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, then withdrew his amendment, and moved to strike out the second section of the bill; which is as follows:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be paid to the Post Office Department, out of the appropriation of $346,500 granted by the first section of the act of 3d March, 1857, 'for transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back,' the sum of $16,757 70, for five outward trips from New York to Liverpool, to wit: on 14th February and 11th April, 1857, and 13th February, 13th March, and 10th April, 1858, when the Collins line failed to perform service; and that the further sum of $35,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be paid to the Post Office Department, out of the appropriation aforesaid, to enable the Postmaster General to procure the transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool and back, on the 24th April, the 8th and 22d May, and the 5th and 19th June, 1858, if the Collins line should fail to perform service on those days."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understand that under the law, E. K. Collins and his associates have a contract with the Government. This is an attempt to interfere with that contract. If he violates or fails to comply with his contract, then, I take it, it will be for the Department to declare the contract void or to refuse to pay him for the service which he does not perform. But if we go on now and take this contract out of his hands, and authorize the payment of a portion of this money out of the Treasury by the Postmaster General, to make contracts with others to carry the mails, Collins and his associates will have a claim upon the Government for damages, to I know not what amount.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I simply ask to have read two communications from the Postmaster General—one in relation to this amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, and the other in relation to the other amendment which the gentleman offered.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall object to the reading, if it occupies more than five minutes.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have risen to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, and I have a right to have the papers read as a portion of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time occupied by the reading will come out of the gentleman's five minutes.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the provision in the bill in relation to the Bremen and Havre lines is independent legislation, and not in accordance with existing law, and is, therefore, out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Whilst the Chair would agree with the gentleman from Mississippi, that it is out of order, and ought not to be in the bill, yet the House has referred the whole matter embraced in the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the Chair, therefore, could not take jurisdiction to attempt to revise it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. If the Chair please, the question has not been settled by the House whether it is independent legislation or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi will remember that the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union by the order of the House, and it is to be presumed, at least, that it was read twice before it was so referred.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now ask that the communications which I sent to the Clerk's desk may be read.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. We may as well have this question settled. The Constitution of the United States allows the President to communicate with this House in a particular way. These appointees of his generally make their reports to him, and he communicates them to the House. What I mean to say is this, that neither the President nor any head of a Department can constitute an agent here to make speeches for him submitted in writing. They are not allowed to appear here either in person or by an agent to make speeches.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order. The Chair supposes that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has a right to have the papers read as a portion of his remarks.

The Clerk then read the following communication:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, April 21, 1858.
SIR: Under the authority conferred by the first section of the "Act to provide for the transportation of the mail between the United States and foreign countries, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1845, (Statutes, vol. 6, page 748,) this Department has deemed it essential to the public interest to cause the United States mails to be carried from New York to Liverpool by other than contract steamers whenever the regular contract mail steamers have not been in place to perform the service at the proper time; and for such service the parties performing it have agreed to receive, as full compensation, the amounts of sea postage on the mails transported by them respectively. Temporary service of this kind has frequently been employed, as I shall show more particularly in another place, to carry the mails which should have been taken on their regular sailing days by the Collins steamers; and, as the service on that line seems to be entirely suspended, I deem it my duty to ask that provision be made out of the appropriation granted by the act of March 3, 1857, (Statutes, third session Thirty Fourth Congress, page 248,) for the "transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back," for defraying, out of the Treasury, the expenses already incurred, as well as those which will be incurred in keeping up on our part, during the current fiscal year, regular post intercourse between New York and Liverpool. These expenses, thus far, amount to $16,737 70, to wit:

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, MAY 29, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 154.

Steamer Alps, from New York, February 14, 1857.....	$4,642 40
Steamer Alps, from New York, April 11, 1857.....	3,183 32
Steamer Edinburgh, from New York, February 13, 1858.....	3,057 24
Steamer New York, from New York, March 13, 1858.....	3,134 23
Steamer City of Baltimore, from New York, April 10, 1858.....	2,740 51

Amount ascertained.....$16,737 70

The foregoing is for mails outward only, but in future it is intended to arrange for voyages out and back; and if the public be assured that vessels will be dispatched so as to alternate with the British mail steamers from New York, it is probable that the amount of mail matter sent by them will be considerably greater than has been carried on the outward trips already made. Should this prove to be correct, and should the Department succeed in procuring suitable steamships to transport the mails out and back for the sea postages, then it is estimated that the further sum of $35,000 will be required to perform the remaining trips set for the Collins line within the present fiscal year, to wit: April 24, May 8 and 22, and June 5 and 19, 1858, five trips, at $7,000 per round trip.

I submit herewith the draught of such an amendment as appears to me to be required to carry out the objects before stated to the end of the present fiscal year.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully,

AARON V. BROWN,
Postmaster General.

Hon. J. GLANCY JONES, Chairman Committee Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

The amendment proposing to strike out the second section of the bill was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out the following paragraph, from the eighth to the fourteenth line, inclusive:

"For transportation of the mails from New York by Southampton or Cowes to Bremen, and from New York by Southampton or Cowes to Havre, $230,000.
"For contingencies in the mail service between New York and Europe, $120,000."

I offer the amendment upon the ground that there is no existing contract for this money to be applied to; and that there is no law authorizing a contract to be made. If there was a law, a contract would be made. But this provision, if it pass in this bill, would be construed into authority to make this contract. The first provision is for $230,000, and the other one for contingencies, which is an entirely new item, makes up the entire sum of $350,000, which is the amount of the original contract proposed for the lines between New York and Havre and Bremen. And, as I have said, it will certainly be construed into authority for making a new contract for the lines, without any other law.

Mr. SICKLES obtained the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the gentleman from New York to allow a letter to be read from the Postmaster General explaining these items.

Mr. SICKLES. Very well, let the letter be read.

The letter was read by the Clerk, as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, April 21, 1858.

SIR: In the estimates for the mail service to foreign countries, which I had the honor to submit on the 24th ultimo, pursuant to the requirements of the second section of the organic act of July 2, 1836, I stated that the Department was not certain that after the expiration of the present contracts for the transportation of the mails between New York and Bremen, and New York and Havre, on the 1st June next, it could procure the mails to be carried on those lines during the year 1859, for the United States postages, sea and inland, accruing from each of them. Information since received tends to increase that uncertainty so much that I deem it my duty to submit such a modification of those estimates as will, in my opinion, place the service upon a footing of regularity and efficiency at least equal to that obtained under the original contract with the Ocean Steam Navigation Company, which expired in June, 1857. To accomplish this purpose, it will be necessary to place at the disposal of the Department, for the year ending June 30, 1859, a sum equal to the compensation formerly paid under that contract for two ships to Bremen and two to Havre, which was $350,000 per annum, for twelve trips on each line. For this sum, and probably for much less, I am confident that the requisite service can be procured, but at all events it will be the endeavor of the Department to obtain it on the best possible terms.

I would further respectfully suggest that, as the continuance of the service on the Collins line between New York and Liverpool is uncertain, a proviso be attached to the appropriation for that line for the year ending June 30, 1859, authorizing this Department to be paid therefrom such sums as may be required for the transportation of the mails to Liverpool and back, on the days the Collins line may fail to take them.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c.,

AARON V. BROWN,
Postmaster General.

Hon. JAMES L. ORR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SEWARD. The rule requires the gentleman to speak in opposition to the amendment. Now I submit that that letter makes a speech in favor of it, and is out of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. SICKLES. I regard that letter as a much better speech than I can make, and as conclusive against the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee. I will therefore content myself with no remarks on the subject in addition.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I rise to a question of order, the decision of which involves the same point made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] It is that the appropriation contained in the items of appropriation, of $350,000, is for the payment of no contract authorized under existing law and, in fact, for no contract existing at all; and is, therefore, under the 81st rule, out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Louisiana is the same point made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DAVIS] a few minutes ago, and overruled by the Chair, upon the ground that this bill has been read twice in the House, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, after which the Chair does not feel himself authorized in ruling out of order any provision which has received the sanction of the House.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask the Chair if it is now in order for the friends of the paragraph proposed to be stricken out to move to amend it?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move to amend, then, by inserting the word "one" after "thirty" in line ten, so as to make the appropriation $231,000.

Mr. Chairman, in respect to the question in dispute upon this paragraph of the bill, nothing need be said. My only object in seeking the floor is that the committee may act understandingly when they come to pass upon these questions. I think gentlemen have fallen into an error regarding the authority which vests the Secretary of the Navy with power to make contracts upon this subject. I will refer gentlemen to the clause in the act of 1845 which confers the authority. It is the following:

"And such contracts may be made, if it shall appear to the Postmaster General to be required by the public interest, for any greater period than four years, and not exceeding ten years."

The limitation is not upon the life of the law, but distinctly upon the terms of the contract. It is a matter presented to the discretion of the Postmaster General. If he thinks the public interests require him to enter into a contract for a longer period than the minimum, then it is perfectly within the letter and spirit of the law for him to make it; and this appropriation is but for the purpose of carrying out an existing contract entered into by your Secretary, under and by virtue of the law which I have specified.

Sir, I have listened, with some degree of grief and surprise, to opinions expressed in this House in depreciation of the favors claimed to be shown upon the locality which I, in part, represent.

Sir, nothing which conduces to the advantage of the commerce of that great metropolis is or can be local in its nature; it is as important and general as commerce itself, universally absorbing; and whenever postal facilities are extended to the commerce of a country, they partake of the general and catholic character of the commerce of the world. I will say to gentlemen at the South, as well as those from the West, that we of the North and the East, upon the Atlantic borders, are quite as willing that the same facilities should be extended to them as we now claim for ourselves, and indeed greater.

Sir, it is nature, and not art, that constitutes the great empire of trade. You might as well try to dip up and roll back Niagara with the hand as to turn aside the natural currents of commerce. New York enjoys her advantages, not by reason of the artificial influences of legislation, but because she sits enthroned the mistress of commerce, the queen of the seas. Into her lap flow the tides of commerce, because commerce follows the avenues and obeys the impulses of profit. Let gentlemen in other parts of the country enlarge their enterprise; let gentlemen everywhere facilitate and expand a generous but constitutional system of internal improvements, and, my word for it, steamers and commerce and art and industry will abound with them as with us; to their affluent prosperity as to ours.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. The gentleman says that by the law the Postmaster General is authorized to make contracts to be reported to this House. Now, the Postmaster General states in the letter which has been read that these two contracts have not been entered into by him. He made that statement at the time he made his report to Congress, at the commencement of this session. He thought that he would be able to make a contract with the persons who had before taken the mails for the postage; but he is satisfied he cannot make such a contract for the year 1859, and therefore he desires an appropriation made by Congress. For what purpose? To enable him to do that which he says he cannot now do; to enable him to make a contract, and not to execute contracts already made. How stands the argument of the gentleman from New York? Although authority is given by law to the Postmaster General to make a contract, yet you know from the testimony furnished by the Postmaster General himself, that no contract exists now, and that this appropriation is to authorize or enable him to make the contract, a contract which he will never make unless he gets this appropriation.

He talks of New York as the queen of the seas. How does she happen to be the queen of the seas? She has made the West tributary to her greatness; she has made the South tributary to her greatness. If she is, then, so much a queen, how is it she asks subsidies for her lines of steamers? He says that when other cities have done as much for themselves as New York, they may expect some return. How are we to compete with New York lines of steamers when they get subsidies of $300,000 for their lines and we do not get a dollar? If that appropriation for New York is necessary, is it not equally necessary for New Orleans? Now, if the gentleman is the generous and fair-minded man he pretends to be, let him give us this one line South. Dare he do it? No, sir. He knows when the time shall ever come, as come it will, I hope, that Congress shall cease to make unfair discriminations against the South and in favor of the North, this queen of the seas will be compelled to surrender her diamonds and doff her royal robes. He says New York has natural advantages. Then let her look to her natural advantages, and not eternally nauseate this House by their everlasting cry of give, give—demand of more, more. Let her be content with her natural advantages, or grant unto others what she asks for herself.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Permit me to answer for myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Several MEMBERS. "Question," "Question."

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. JOHN COCHRANE to the amendment of Mr. JONES, of Tennessee; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. GARNETT. I move to amend the amendment by striking out these words:

"For contingencies in the mail service between New York and Europe, $120,000."

The rest of the section is a definite appropriation. The words I propose to strike out are indefinite. The object is not specified. It is such an appropriation as ought not to be made. I move to strike it out, in no spirit of opposition to the bill, but simply on the ground that all of our appropriations should be specific.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I am opposed to the amendment for the reason I assigned a moment ago against another amendment; and that is, I believe, that no good is to be accomplished by any discussion. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The question was taken on Mr. GARNETT's amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I am glad the committee has ruled these two amendments to be in order, for the amendment which I propose is of a similar character. It is as follows:

Insert after "dollars," in the eleventh line, the following:

And for the transportation of the mails from New Orleans to Bordeaux, via Havana, Bermuda, Payal, and Santander, and back, there shall be, and is hereby appropriated, to be paid every year, for ten years, out of any moneys in the Treasury, a sum equal to that herein appropriated for the transportation of the mails on either of the routes from New York to Europe, according to the computed length thereof, estimating the pay per mile on the route from New Orleans by what may be given to the New York route.

Mr. ENGLISH. I raise a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the decision of the committee the Chair rules that amendment out of order.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCALES and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes twenty-four—not a majority of a quorum. So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GARNETT. Is it in order, before the section is concluded, to offer an amendment to the amendment, to come in in line five?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have passed that part of the section.

Mr. GARNETT. I believe the ruling of former Chairmen has been, that when a section had been read it was in order to offer an amendment to any part of it. We are now upon the third section, and therefore an amendment to any part of the section is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia if there be no objection on the part of the committee.

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the practice of the committee has been, that when a section is divided into paragraphs, it is read by paragraphs; and that when a paragraph has been once read and passed, the committee cannot return to it again except by unanimous consent.

The Clerk then concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to offer an amendment to the clause providing for the transportation of the mail between Charleston and Havana. I move to strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred," so that it shall read "one hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. SICKLES. I rise to a point of order. That portion of the section is passed, and an amendment to it is not in order.

The question was put on the amendment, and the chairman announced that the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARNETT obtained the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. I propose to continue on the floor, and make a five-minute speech upon my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did not proceed to speak when he offered his amendment, and the Chair put the question.

Mr. GARNETT. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SEWARD. I am entitled to the floor myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman may address that side of the House, and I propose to address this.

Mr. GARNETT. I do not desire to dispute a question of privilege with the gentleman from Georgia, as he is very seldom on the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. Chairman—[Cries of "Order!"] I am in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is not in order, and the Chair calls him to order.

Mr. SEWARD. I moved an amendment, and I have a right—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the gentleman to order; and if he cannot preserve order in committee he will appeal to the House.

Mr. SEWARD. I have no objection to your doing that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. Am I not entitled to raise a question of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is; and he will state his point of order.

Mr. SEWARD. My point of order is, that my amendment was not reported or read by the Clerk, or announced by the Chair to the committee. The Chair put the question precipitately, and announced the result before any one could say a word; and I was thereby cut off from saying what I desired. I appeal to the Chair whether I am not strictly correct?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not remember; but he does remember that he was of the impression that the gentleman from Georgia did not intend to make a speech, because he saw no effort whatever on his part to do so; whereas, heretofore, when the gentleman desired to make a speech, there has been the highest evidence of his desire to do so.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, sir, I yield to the decision of the Chair upon that statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNETT resumed the floor.

Mr. ENGLISH. I rise to a question of order. It is, that this bill has been read through, and now the gentleman from Virginia proposes to go back to amend a portion of the bill which has been passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know what the gentleman from Virginia proposes to do, and he will hear the gentleman before he attempts to rule upon the point of order.

Mr. GARNETT. I move to amend the seventeenth line by striking out the word "dollars," and inserting "cents;" so that it will read—

For transportation of the mails across the Isthmus of Panama, one hundred thousand cents.

I thought, when I first rose, that we were considering the clause contained in the fourteenth and fifteenth lines. I have offered one or two amendments before. I had one amendment about which I had consulted with a number of gentlemen in the Hall, which they approved, and which I thought important. I desire to have a vote in the House upon the amendment which I shall indicate before I take my seat. If the committee will grant me that favor I will be content.

But when the gentleman from Maine rises and makes objection to amendments, because he thinks the committee is not in a proper state of mind to do that which we ought to do, I must say, though I am as much in favor of adjourning on the 7th of June as any gentleman, yet I will not agree to adjourn then, unless the business we undertake to do is done intelligibly. The amendment which I desired to offer, and which I now ask consent to offer, is this:

No contract shall hereafter be made for the transportation of the mail by ocean steamers on any route, for a compensation exceeding the postal revenues accruing from the transportation of the mails on such route; and all existing contracts, stipulating for a different or larger compensation, shall be terminated as soon as their terms will permit.

I ask the committee to allow me to move this amendment in the place of the one I offered when I first rose, and that it may go to the House, so that we may have a vote upon it by yeas and nays.

Mr. RITCHIE objected.

Mr. GARNETT. I withdraw the amendment which I offered.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have another small bill, which provides for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the Indians; and with the consent of the committee, I propose to take it up and consider it now.

Mr. GARNETT. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is upon the floor.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 557) making supplemental appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1859.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I have been here for nine hours, and I am not willing to stay any longer. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. PEYTON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BOGOCCK and MAYNARD were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 29.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Housron reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail by ocean steamers and otherwise during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, and had directed him to report the same to the House without amendment; also, that the committee had had under consideration bill No. 557, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to recommit the mail steamer appropriation bill to the Committee of Ways and Means; and demanded the previous question.

And then, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, (at twenty minutes to nine o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Friday, May 28, 1858.

Prayer by the Rev. J. M. Wilson.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 19th of May, a report of the Secretary of the Navy, information connected with the arrest of William Walker and his associates, with copies of the correspondence, &c., as afforded by the files of that Department; which, on motion of Mr. Foor, was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information respecting the appointment of Alexander G. Penn and Emilié La Sere, as disbursing agents at New Orleans, the nature of their services, and the compensation they receive; which, on motion of Mr. Wilson, was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information respecting frauds on the revenue, alleged to have been committed by a partner in the commercial house of Simon de Visser & José Villarubia, of New Orleans; which was read.

Mr. KING. I offered the resolution to which this communication from the Secretary of the Treasury is a reply. My object was to ascertain whether there was any sufficient grounds to charge, as was freely done here in debate, upon the officers of the customs, a complicity in those frauds. I am very happy to find that the investigation acquits them. I think it due to them that it should go on the record; and I therefore move that the communication be printed.

The motion was referred to the Committee on Printing.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter of the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, returning, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, the bill and papers in the case of Alexander J. Atocha; which were ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented papers in relation to the claim of John W. Geary, for the reimbursement of money expended while Governor of the Territory of Kansas; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented papers in relation to the removal of the offices belonging to the United States, and occupied in the collection of revenue at the present quarantine station in the port of New York, to the new quarantine site; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADE presented a memorial of the clerks, messengers, and watchmen of the Washington navy-yard, praying that an appropriation may be made to carry out the laws of 1852 and 1854 giving them twenty per cent. additional pay; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. JONES presented a memorial of Hosea B. Horn and others, praying for a grant of land on Green river, in the Territory of Utah, for the purpose of settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the memorial of Jonas P. Levy, for himself and others who are engaged in mining operations at the Pedregal mines, in Mexico, praying that the President may be authorized to compel the Mexican Government to liquidate their claims; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BROWN presented a memorial of the principal business men on Pennsylvania avenue, in Washington city, representing that a railroad along that avenue is not asked for nor wished by the great body of the citizens of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PUGH presented the petition of Joseph Taylor, postmaster at Gratis, Ohio, praying to be released from responsibility for postage stamps destroyed by fire while in his possession; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the public lands may be laid out in farms or lots of limited size for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BIGLER presented a memorial of the Magnetic and New England Union Telegraph Company, in reply to the remonstrance of the American Telegraph Company, correcting certain errors and fallacies of that company, and asking further legislation by Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARLAN presented a petition of citizens of Iowa, praying for the establishment of a mail route between Grinnell and Marietta, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JONES, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Mary E. Larnard, be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, it was Ordered, That Thomas Hateman have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. BIGLER, it was Ordered, That the heirs of Andrew Gardner, deceased, have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. POLK, it was Ordered, That the petition of Wilson & Brothers, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a resolution to compensate Willis A. Gorman, for certain services, reported a bill (S. No. 417) for the relief of Willis A. Gorman; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the petition of citizens of Michigan, relative to a division of the Indian agency in that State; and a petition of citizens of Michigan in favor of granting a homestead to certain mixed-blood Indians, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 387) for the better regulation of sales and entries of the public lands, and to limit the fees of the registers and receivers at the several land offices, reported it without amendment.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon, and moved that they lie on the table; which was agreed to:

A bill (S. No. 11) making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Keokuk to Fort Madison, through the southern tier of counties in said State to the Missouri river;

A bill (S. No. 12) making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad from McGregor's Landing to the western boundary of said State;

A bill (S. No. 33) to authorize the State of Iowa to apply the unsold lands, heretofore granted for the improvement of the navigation of the Des Moines river, to the construction of a railroad in the valley of said river;

A bill (S. No. 63) making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State;

A bill (S. No. 231) granting public lands to the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, to aid in the construction of railroads in said Territories; and

A bill (S. No. 236) granting public lands to the Territory of Kansas for the purpose of constructing certain railroads therein.

Mr. STUART. In reporting back these bills, I beg leave to state that the committee came to the conclusion, after an examination of all the questions involved, that it would not be advisable at this time to originate in the Senate any bills making grants of land. If any action were taken by the House of Representatives, as was done in the last Congress, the committee would consider such bills.

Mr. STUART also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of a homestead to actual settlers, presented May 15; a petition of citizens of Albany, New York, in favor of granting homesteads to actual settlers, presented March 24; two petitions of citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, in favor of granting homesteads to actual settlers, presented March 29; a petition of citizens of Hopkinsville, Ohio, in favor of granting homesteads to actual settlers, presented February 15; a petition of citizens of West Elkton, Ohio, in favor of granting homesteads to actual settlers, presented March 1; a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, praying a grant of land for the McGregor, St. Peter's, and Missouri railroad, presented February 23; a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, praying a grant of land for the McGregor, St. Peter's, and Missouri railroad, presented December 12; a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, praying a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Fort Dodge to Sioux Falls, presented April 2; a memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, praying for a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad, presented December 17; a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, praying a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Mineral Point and Portage City railroad, presented May 10; a memorial of the Mayor and Board of Common Council of the city of Atchison, praying aid in the construction of a railroad, presented April 7; a memorial of the president and directors of the Metropolitan Railroad Company, praying an act of incorporation and a grant of land, presented April 8; a memorial of citizens of Clark county, Missouri, remonstrating against the appropriation of certain lands for the improvement of the Des Moines river to the construction of a railroad, presented February 24; a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of St. Louis, Missouri, that certain lands be granted for the construction of the Keokuk and Fort Des Moines railroad, presented May 20; a petition of citizens of Burlington, Iowa, for aid in the construction of railroads in Nebraska, presented February 18; a petition of citizens of Dubuque, Iowa, for aid in the construction of railroads in Nebraska, presented January 21; five petitions of citizens of Iowa, praying for a grant of land to the McGregor, St. Peter's, and Missouri river railroad, presented February 17; a memorial of citizens of Iowa Falls, praying for a grant of land to aid in the construction of railroads west of the Missouri, presented January 27; a memorial of citizens of Fort Dodge, Iowa, praying for a grant of land to aid in the construction of railroads west of the Missouri, presented January 27; two memorials of citizens of Sioux City, Iowa, praying for a grant of land to aid in the construction of railroads west of the Missouri, presented February 11; a petition of citizens of Dubuque, Iowa, for aid to the Territory of Nebraska, in the construction of a railroad, presented January 4; a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of restricting the sale of public lands to actual settlers, presented March 1; a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, in favor of granting homesteads to actual settlers, presented March 10; a memorial of citizens of New York, in favor of granting homesteads to actual settlers, presented February 9; a memorial of citizens of New York, in favor of granting homesteads to actual settlers, presented February 10; a memorial of citizens of New York, in favor of granting homesteads to actual settlers, presented April 8; a petition of citizens of New York and New Jersey, in favor of granting homesteads to actual settlers, presented February 17; a petition of citizens of New York, of like import, presented March 29; a petition of citizens of New York, of like import, presented March 30; a petition of citizens of New York, of like import, presented February 16; a petition of citizens of the United States, of like import, presented February 8; a petition of citizens of Terryville, Connecticut, of like import, presented February 4; a petition of citizens of New York, of like import, presented February 1; a petition of citizens of New York, of like import, presented May 11; a petition of citizens of New York, of like import, presented May 11; a petition of citizens of Morrow county, Ohio, of like import, presented February 11; a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, praying a donation of land to the Territory of Nebraska, to aid in the construction of railroads, presented February 24; a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, praying a donation of land to aid in the construction of a railroad between the State of Iowa and Sioux City, on the Missouri river, presented March 1; a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, praying a donation of land to the Territory of Nebraska, to aid in the construction of a railroad, presented March 1; a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, asking a grant of land to a railroad between Prairie du Chien and Mankato, presented February 24; a memorial and resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, relative to a grant of land for improving the navigation of the Des Moines river, presented April 16; four memorials of citizens of Iowa, praying that land may be donated to aid in the construction of the Keokuk and Des Moines railroad, presented February 8; two petitions of citizens of Missouri, against any change in the application of land granted for the improvement of the Des Moines river, presented May 19; a petition of citizens of Warsaw, Illinois, against any change in the application of land granted for the improvement of the Des Moines river, presented May 21; a petition of citizens of Missouri, against any change in the application of land granted for the improvement of the Des Moines river, presented May 3; asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they lie on the table; which was agreed to.

BRITISH AGGRESSIONS.

Mr. MASON. The Committee on Foreign Relations have directed me to present a report, which, with the indulgence of the Senate, as it is not long, I will read:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate instructing them "to inquire whether any legislation is necessary to enable the President of the United States to protect American vessels against British aggression in the Gulf of Mexico or elsewhere," and to whom has also been referred the message of the President of the United States communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate, information concerning the recent search or seizure of American vessels by foreign armed cruisers in the Gulf of Mexico, have had the same under consideration, and now report:

The documents accompanying the message of the President, show a series of aggressive acts on the commerce of the United States in the Gulf of Mexico, and off the West India Islands, by the naval forces of Great Britain, of a character so marked and extraordinary as to have fixed the attention of the country.

American vessels pursuing the paths of lawful commerce on the high seas, or passing near the American coast from one domestic port to another, under the flag of their country, have been pursued, fired into, and compelled to stop by the public force of a foreign Power; questioned as to their destination, their cargo, and the character of their crew; required to submit to an examination of their sea papers, and to a scrutiny into the objects and purpose of their voyage.

In other instances, American vessels anchored in the harbor of a friendly Power, at the port of Sagua la Grande, in the Island of Cuba, have been subjected to a police inquiry by the same foreign Power, and in like manner required to exhibit their papers, and to submit to questions as to their destination, the cause of their absence from home, and the number and character of their crews.

It would appear from the letter of the consul of the United States at Havana, (a document accompanying the message,) that not less than fifteen American vessels lying in the harbor, or in port at Sagua la Grande, were made to undergo this humiliating system of espionage, whilst six vessels on the high seas in the Gulf of Mexico, bearing their country's flag, were, as above stated, by actual exhibition and use of force, endangering, in some instances, the lives of those on board, compelled to stop and submit to detention, until a boarding officer was satisfied in such questions as it was his pleasure to put.

Besides the instances above cited, officially communicated with the President's message in reply to a call of the Senate, each successive arrival from the infested quarter brings intelligence of new and additional aggressions of like character, committed by the same Power, on vessels bearing the flag of the United States.

It has occasionally happened heretofore, under circumstances of misapprehension, or mis-construction of orders, or from other and like causes, that vessels of the United States have been subjected by the armed force of a foreign Power to visitation and search, in violation of international law, and in derogation of the independence of our flag, and in such isolated cases the honor of the country may have been sufficiently vindicated by a disclaimer of intended wrong or by rebuke of the officer offending. But the continuous and persevering character of the aggressions now brought to the notice of the country, and almost within sight of our shores, is sufficient to arouse the just indignation of the country, and calls, in the opinion of the committee, for the most prompt and efficient measures, to arrest at once, and to end finally and forever, the commission of like indignities to our flag.

The documents accompanying the message disclose the fact that these acts of visitation and examination of American vessels were sought to be justified under the plea of necessity for the suppression of the slave trade, supposed to be or actually carried out, between Africa and the Island of Cuba.

The committee will not go into any inquiry in reference to such alleged necessity. It is sufficient for them to know that the assent of the United States, although often invoked, has never been yielded to any such system of police on the seas. They rest on the position, not to be controverted, that by no principle of international law can a vessel under the flag of its country be visited or detained on the high seas in time of peace by any foreign Power under any pretext, or for any purpose whatever, without the consent of those over whom the flag waves.

Without going at large into the questions heretofore involved as to the rights of independent nations on that common highway of the world—the open sea—the committee deem this, nevertheless, a fit occasion to declare the principles always maintained by the United States as regulating the use of the open or high seas in time of peace, and from which are derived rights to the people of the United States admitting no restraint or qualification, and to be maintained at whatever cost.

There is no right of visitation, far less of search, to be exercised in time of peace by any nation on the ships or vessels of other nations, nor can there be so long as the laws of the civilized world touching the freedom of the sea are respected by civilized men. Such claim, therefore, having no foundation in law or in the equity of nations can never be tolerated by an independent Power, but in derogation of her sovereignty. Neither is there any distinction to be drawn in the claim of right between visitation at sea by the armed vessels of a foreign Power when unattended by examination and search, and such visitation when so attended.

The offense and violation of public law consists in the visitation, without regard to its purpose, when claimed as a right, against the will of the party subjected to it. Were it otherwise, there would follow, of course, the correlative right to arrest and detain the vessel until the visitation is effected.

The committee find these principles admitted and enforced by the opinions and the decisions of the most eminent judicial authorities, both in this country and in Great Britain.

[The case of the "Manana Flora," in the Supreme Court of the United States, reported in 11 Wheaton, page 1. And in England the case of "Le Louis," decided by Lord Stowell in 1817, and reported in Dodson's Admiralty Reports, vol. 2, page 210.]

They are founded in two simple elemental principles of public law: First, in the equality of all independent States; and, second, the common use, by all recognized States, of the open sea as a highway in time of peace.

Such are the rights and immunities of our citizens navigating the ocean, which have been flagrantly violated and outraged by armed vessels of a foreign Power in time of professed peace, and, in some instances, almost within sight of our own shores.

Indignant as the American people are, and ought to be, at the character and persistent repetition of such aggressions, yet their occurrence and gravity will opportunely supply the occasion, and to end, now and forever, all future question as to this right of visitation at sea between the United States and the offending Power. And the committee refrain only from recommending at once such additional legislation as would be most effectual to protect the commerce of the country from aggressions of the character thus brought to the notice of the Senate, from the fact that the President (as shown by the letter of the Secretary of the Navy accompanying the message) has already ordered all the disposable naval force of the country into the infested quarter, with orders "to protect all vessels of the United States on the high seas from search or detention by the vessels of war of any other nation." These are preventive measures only, and temporary in their character, but, in the judgment of the committee, go to the full extent of the power of the Executive in the absence of legislative provision. It is believed, however, they will arrest, for the present, further like offenses in the quarter whence they have proceeded.

It appears further from these documents that the altered state of the relations between the United States and Great Britain, which must arise from this aggressive conduct of her armed vessels, has been already brought to the notice of that Power, by communications from the Secretary of State addressed both to the British Minister here and to the Minister of the United States at London.

It cannot be known until the result of these communications is laid before Congress how far the acts in question will be avowed or disclaimed by the Government held responsible. It is the earnest hope of the committee that the course that Government may adopt will be of a character to satisfy the just demands of this Government, and, at the same time, to furnish a guarantee against the repetition of the offense. Nothing short of this, in the opinion of the committee, will be compatible with peaceful relations between the two countries.

In the present posture of the affair, therefore, the committee forbear from recommending any additional legislation to enable the President to protect American vessels on the high seas from the aggressions of foreign Powers. But they will not forbear the declaration, that such legislation must be promptly supplied, should the result show that it is needed to afford instant and full immunity to vessels engaged in lawful commerce on the high seas from all arrest, molestation, or detention, made under any pretext, or from any quarter.

In conclusion, the committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, (as the judgment of the Senate,) That American vessels on the high seas, in time of peace, bearing the American flag, remain under the jurisdiction of the country to which they belong; and therefore any visitation, molestation, or detention of such vessels by force, or by the exhibition of force, on the part of a foreign Power, is in derogation of the sovereignty of the United States.

Resolved, That the recent and repeated violations of this immunity, committed by vessels of war belonging to the navy of Great Britain in the Gulf of Mexico and the adjacent seas, by firing into, interrupting, and forcibly detaining them on their voyage, requires, in the judgment of the Senate, such unequivocal and final disposition of the subject, by the Governments of Great Britain and the United States, touching the rights involved, as shall preclude hereafter the occurrence of like aggressions.

Resolved, That the Senate fully approves the action of the Executive in sending a naval force into the infested seas with orders "to protect all vessels of the United States on the high seas from search or detention by the vessels of war of any other nation." And it is the opinion of the Senate, that, if it become necessary, such additional legislation should be supplied in aid of the Executive power as will make such protection effectual.

I ask that the report and resolutions may be printed. The subject being of interest, one which properly attracts the attention of the country; and besides, that we may inform the Executive of the disposition and views of the Senate on the subject, I shall ask to-morrow morning that the resolutions may be considered.

The motion to print was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 414) to reimburse the corporation of Georgetown in the District of Columbia, a sum of money advanced towards the construction of Little Falls bridge; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. IVERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 46) authorizing the payment of certain moneys to certain Cherokee Indians, remaining east of the Rocky Mountains; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SEBASTIAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 415) to extend the principles of the preemption act to certain lands herein mentioned, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 416) for the relief of Mark W. Izard; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

POST ROUTE IN MARYLAND.

Mr. PEARCE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the propriety of establishing a post route from Smyrna, in Delaware, via Chesterville, in Kent county, Maryland, to Chestertown, in the same county.

ARKANSAS BONDS.

Mr. SEBASTIAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of a law authorizing the sale of the bonds of the State of Arkansas, now held in trust by the United States, and report by bill or otherwise.

RIVERS AND HARBORS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to preserve the works heretofore commenced to protect the harbor of San Diego, also to survey the rivers and harbors of California.

EXTENSION OF THE SESSION.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution, and asked for its immediate consideration; but several Senators objected:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the resolution, directing the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to declare their respective Houses adjourned sine die on the first Monday of June next, at twelve o'clock, m., be, and the same is hereby, rescinded; and that the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives declare their respective Houses adjourned sine die on Monday, the 21st of June next, at twelve o'clock, m.

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. GREEN. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to the Senate, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a full and complete list of all collection districts for the collection of duties on imports; showing in each district:

1. The amount of revenue annually collected;
 2. The amount expended for salaries of officers and employees annually; and
 3. The amounts expended for custom-houses, or rents of offices, and warehouses.
- Also, that he state what custom-houses, or ports of entry or delivery, can be dispensed with, with a proper regard to economy and the security of the collection of the revenue, and consistently with commercial interests; or what modification of the laws are necessary for the public interests in relation to the collection of customs.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution now; but I wish to move an amendment to it, or suggest one which I hope the Senator will accept, and that is, that the Secretary shall report the officers that may be discharged from these several offices.

Mr. GREEN. The resolution includes all that.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think that is covered by the resolution.

Mr. KING. In order that the Senator may look into it and have the resolution perfected, I object to its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution lies over.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (No. 243) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859;

A bill (No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859; and

A bill (No. 558) making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail, by ocean steamers and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, the bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives insists upon its amendment to the twenty-third amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 201) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, disagreed to by the Senate, and upon its disagreement to the first, fourth, fifth, sixth, eleventh, twelfth, twenty-first, twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, and thirtieth amendments of the Senate to the said bill; it agrees to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and has appointed Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, Mr. V. R. HORTON, and Mr. JAMES JACKSON, managers on the part of the House.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. POLK. I wish to make a privileged motion. At the request of another Senator, I move the reconsideration of the vote which was yesterday taken, refusing to increase the compensation of the officers of the revenue service; saying, at the same time, that I do not pledge myself to vote for the bill when it comes up. I voted against it; but, at the special request of a Senator, I move the reconsideration for the purpose of bringing the question before the Senate again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion will be entered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill entitled "An act for extending the land laws east of the Cascade mountains in Oregon and Washington Territories;" and it was signed by the Vice President.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order of the day is the Private Calendar.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to postpone all prior orders, for the purpose of taking up the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has called up the Private Calendar, this day being set apart by order of the Senate for the consideration of the Private Calendar. The Senator from Virginia moves that it be postponed with a view to take up the appropriation bill named by him.

Mr. IVERSON. I trust the motion of the Senator from Virginia will not prevail, but that the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar. We have devoted only two days in this whole session to the consideration of private bills, excepting when some were taken up out of their order in the morning hour. There are a large number of very meritorious cases, in my opinion, some of which I have reported myself, that I am satisfied ought to pass the Senate, and will pass the Senate if considered. It is important to private claimants—and certainly they have as strong a claim on the Government as any creditors—that their claims should be considered at this session of Congress, so that they may go to the House of Representatives and be considered there at the next session; for if they be not acted on at this session, of course there will be no possible chance for them to be acted on at the next session. Any bill which may pass now and go to the House of Representatives will stand some chance—not a very good one, I confess—to be acted upon during the next session of Congress by that House. I hope that the Private Calendar will be considered.

On the first of April, it will be remembered, I had a resolution passed, setting apart Fridays for the consideration of private claims. One business or another, especially the Kansas business, postponed the execution of that order from time to time, until about two weeks ago, when we took up the Calendar on one day, passing over such cases as were not the subject of debate; and on last Friday we did the same thing. Now, I insist, when there are a number of bills on the Private Calendar that were reported in the early stage of the session, but have not yet been considered, that justice requires that we should take them up and consider them.

I apprehend that the appropriation bill will pass, and the Senator from Virginia need not be in such a hurry to press it on the consideration of the Senate. I should have been very much inclined to introduce a resolution here, if it were not that it would be considered disrespectful to the Senator from Virginia, declaring that he is a nuisance to this body, [laughter;] for he constantly urges the appropriation bills to the sacrifice of everything else. Every morning he rises and moves to postpone everything to take up the appropriation bills; and it is appropriation bill, and appropriation bill, and the same song forever, that the Senator from Virginia is ringing in the ears of the Senate on every occasion when he has an opportunity. I think it is asking too much; it is crowding on the agony rather too high; and I trust the Senate will not indulge the Senator from Virginia on this occasion, but let us go on with the consideration of private bills. I call for the yeas and nays on the proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. I am going to vote for the motion of the gentleman from Virginia; but after the speech of the Senator from Georgia, I must say that it is not to be understood that I agree with him in considering the Senator from Virginia, in an unqualified sense, a nuisance. [Laughter.] My object is to go with him in postponing the Private Calendar for the purpose of taking up the river and harbor bills.

Mr. HUNTER. I believe, if my motion prevails, the appropriation bill will come up in its order, as a matter of course; everything prior to it being postponed. It will come up without further motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the motion of the Senator from Virginia prevails, the Chair will call up the appropriation bill, which will then be subject to any motion that may be made in regard to it.

Mr. GWIN. I think it would be a great deal better for us to ascertain whether we are going to continue the session longer than next Monday week, before deciding this question. If we are to adjourn then, we ought to take up the appropriation bills, and act on nothing else. The appropriation bills that have been sent to us already, will require several days' consideration before we pass them. To the very bill the Senator from Virginia is going to call up, appropriating the sum of $2,500,000, the Committee on Finance have added $2,700,000. If we are going to consider the appropriation bills, and are to adjourn on Monday week, we ought to take them up and dispense with all other business before the two Houses, and the Senate especially. To that course I am opposed. I think it would be a disgrace to the country, after the report that came from the Committee on Foreign Relations this morning, if we were to do so. If Congress adjourns, with that question unsettled, and England persists, as I believe she will, in the course which she has adopted, we leave the Government without any means of asserting the rights and the honor of the country. To suppose that we can adjourn on Monday week, after receiving that report, looks to me as an utter impossibility. Therefore, I think the Senator from Virginia need not urge the appropriation bills, for we shall be forced, by necessity, to repeal the joint resolution for adjournment on Monday week, and we shall then have plenty of time, and can look at some of the meritorious private claims that have been here year after year, strictly scrutinized before the Court of Claims, and the Committee on Claims. We can at least get clear of our Calendar by considering those bills and rejecting or passing them. I think the proper course is to postpone the question of taking up the appropriation bill until to-morrow morning, and let us, in the mean time decide whether we are going to adjourn on Monday week. If so, the appropriation bills ought to be the special order every day at eleven o'clock.

The question being taken on Mr. HUNTER's motion by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Bigler, Bright, Clay, Clingman, Collamer, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Johnston of Arkansas, Jones, King, Mason, Pearce, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Seward, Slidell, Stuart, Toombs, and Wright—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Brown, Chandler, Douglas, Fitch, Green, Hamlin, Houston, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Polk, Simmons, Tompkins of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—18.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The business now in order is the bill (H. R. No. 200) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to postpone the consideration of that bill and all prior orders, and take up the river and harbor bills; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Dixon, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Wade, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Collamer, Crittenden, Davis, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Slidell, Toombs, and Wright—32.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. GREEN. I move to postpone the appropriation bill, in order to take up the bill (S. No. 120) for the relief of David Myerle. It is a case of very great hardship. The bill has passed the House of Representatives three times, and has passed the Senate three times, but never has passed both Houses during the same Congress; and as this is the day ordinarily set apart for the consideration of private claims, I think we ought to give them some little attention. I do not apprehend any difficulty in the passage of the appropriation bills, but I do think that justice demands a fair consideration of claimants' cases. It has been gravely proposed in the Senate to prolong the session in order to get time to vote a bounty in the shape of lands. I think it would be much better to take time to consider the just demands of our creditors. We had better be just before we undertake to be generous; and I therefore think that this bill ought to be considered. True, it may not have claims over other bills; but if we cannot take them in gross we must take them in detail, and I therefore submit that motion. ["Oh, no!"] It is suggested to me that it may be called up during some morning hour; and that being the case, I withdraw the motion.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 200) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1859.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was to add the following proviso to the clause appropriating for the coast survey:

Provided, That officers and men of the Army and Navy, when employed on coast-survey service which, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, causes unusual expense, may receive such reasonable allowance, in addition to their regular compensation, as the Secretary may direct: And provided, further, That the allowance for extra subsistence to the assistant in charge of the Coast Survey office shall not exceed the sum authorized by the regulation of the Treasury Department of the 14th of January, 1850; and that the allowance for extra subsistence to officers, when detached from the main party, shall not exceed the sum authorized by the Treasury regulation of May 11, 1844.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in line eighty-two, to strike out "Holmes's" and insert "the best," so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase of the best life-boat, &c.

Mr. HUNTER. The committee instructed me to report this amendment. Afterwards it was reconsidered, and I believe a majority agreed to withdraw it. I was not in that majority. I wish the lines read as they are in the House bill:

The Secretary read as follows:

"For the purchase of 4 Holmes's life-boats, to be placed at each of the twenty-eight life-saving stations on the coast of New Jersey, $6,410."

Mr. HUNTER. I understand, owing to that reconsideration, the majority of the Committee on Finance are in favor of voting down this amendment. I confess I incline to it. I do not think we ought to adopt any special legislation of this kind; we ought not to legislate for individuals in this way. I take it for granted the Secretary of the Treasury will take the best boat, if the power of selection be given to him. But I leave the matter with the Senate; I will not debate it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do I not understand that this amendment is withdrawn?

Mr. HUNTER. I understood the committee reconsidered it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then it is not to be voted on, I suppose?

Mr. POLK. I offer it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is before the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is not authorized to offer it by any committee.

Mr. POLK. I suggest that when the Finance Committee have brought in their report, and it is understood that they offer certain amendments, it is not fair to announce to us, after the bill is called up, that those amendments are withdrawn?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would state to the Senator from Maine that this amendment which the Senator from Missouri renews in case it be withdrawn by the committee, is not for an additional appropriation, but simply to change a word in the clause, the appropriation remaining as it was before.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the amendment will not be made. I do not know that the Senator from Missouri proposes to give any reasons for his suggestion. If he does, I should like to hear them, because I may wish to have the privilege of answering them.

Mr. POLK. I do not propose to give any reason beyond this: that I do not want the bill to say that Mr. Holmes's life-boat shall be taken rather than anybody else's life-boat. Let it be the best life-boat.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state the reasons that influenced the majority of the committee, and they were perfectly satisfactory to me. The provision was moved in the House of Representatives by a member from New Jersey. My attention was attracted to his speech. I read it, and read it carefully. It was a speech so perfectly satisfactory to the House of Representatives that this clause, as he proposed it, should be inserted, that it was inserted, I believe, without a division. The arguments he gave—they have now passed from me—were satisfactory to me. The outline of it was that it had been ascertained satisfactorily by everybody connected with this service, those not interested at all in the boat, that this was the best life-boat unquestionably, and the only one that would answer the purpose. Not only that, but we understood that the boat had been here; it had been under examination by the officers connected with the Department, and they unanimously recommended it as the best for the purpose.

Now, the objection to inserting "the best," instead of "Holmes's," is, that the moment you do it, experience has shown there will be a rush on the Department by other people who have other boats; the matter will be delayed; there will be representations and misrepresentations; it will occasion a contest; and the result may be great embarrassment to the Department, and also to protract the thing itself, so that the boats will not be obtained so soon as they ought to be, and the question settled. This reasoning was satisfactory to the committee; it was perfectly satisfactory to the House of Representatives. I know nothing about it except what I heard there. I hope the Senate will disagree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri. It is a peculiar case. As a general rule I would not agree to such a provision; but if you open this matter to competition you will do injury to the service which is of great importance on that shore. I am perfectly indifferent to it, except, as I believe, the public interest would be much better subserved by not making the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. POLK. The reasons the Senator offers are not at all satisfactory to my mind. If it be true that this boat is the best boat, there will be no difficulty about its being taken. I will state the objection I have to the provision. I suppose this boat has something peculiar about it, some new arrangement; but if to-morrow another man should offer a model decidedly better, it could not be taken if you confine the Department to this one boat. In other words, we are not at liberty to have the best boat that may be offered under this clause, for we must take Mr. Holmes's boat. I am not willing to give any such advantage to Mr. Holmes or any other individual citizen. What is the difficulty, if the proper officers have already determined that this is the best boat, in their adhering to that determination?

Mr. HOUSTON. A selection is to be made of the best life-boat which can be obtained for security of life. For my own part, without investigating the subject, I am disposed to defer very much to the opinion of the committee who have had the matter before them, and I am ready to sanction their judgment. I wish to burden the Departments as little as possible with contracts. They are overwhelmed with duties; they have not had an opportunity to investigate the subject so thoroughly as the committee. I would much rather the selection was made by them. There is no political influence operating on them. There is no personal importunity. There is no political influence brought to bear to press the claims of individuals, and warp the judgment of the head of the Department! I have no idea of troubling the Secretary with it, if it can be avoided. I defer very much to the opinion of committees when they have matured a subject and thoroughly investigated it; and I am prepared to vote upon the judgment and finding of the committee in preference to leaving the matter open to competition, and the judgment of one single man controlled by the influences by which he may be surrounded.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. In regard to this life-boat of Mr. Holmes, there is a very considerable difference of opinion, I find, existing amongst those persons who will be called upon to make use of it. I think it is but fair that those brave men upon the New Jersey coast, who are in the habit of boarding ships when stranded and in danger, should at least have an opportunity of being consulted as to the best kind of boat for that purpose. I know myself, from having been upon the shore, that they have a perfect abhorrence of the iron boat which has been furnished at very great expense by the Government, and they prefer the cedar-built boat which they are in the habit of using every day of their lives in going out to the fishing banks. I believe that is the best kind of boat, and I do hope that you will leave the Secretary of the Treasury at liberty to consult these surfmen in regard to the best boat to be used on the New Jersey coast. I think it is very likely that the Holmes boat may be a very good boat. She upsets very easily I believe, and she rights very easily; but these fishermen prefer a boat that will not upset so easily. I hope that the word "Holmes" will be stricken out.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think this objection is very well taken. There can be no reason in the world why the committee of the Senate, or the Senate itself, should determine the particular boat to be taken. This is a class of legislation that always leads to abuse, and is without responsibility. I presume there is no gentleman on the committee who knows anything more about the Holmes boat than I do. I do not suppose the honorable chairman would know it if he was to see it to-morrow. This action is based on representations made. We have not called all the boatmen here to determine which is the best, but we get the representations of an interested party with a patent. Is not any executive officer of the Government a better judge of what will be the best boat of all the boats submitted to him than you and I, sir, and all the Senators who are before me? Nine times out of ten it is a job, and nobody takes an interest in it but the man himself, who comes here or gets somebody to make representations for his benefit to mislead gentlemen in Congress. I recollect that a few years ago we passed a law by which certain patentees made a fortune, requiring that every steamboat should have Francis's life-boat, as if that was the only life-boat that would answer the purpose, and when that was done they charged what they pleased, and compelled the steamboat owners to pay it. As properly stated by the Senator from Missouri, you exclude competition if there should be a better boat.

I think, too, with the honorable Senator from New Jersey, that the hardy men who go out to save life in these boats, and use them, ought to be consulted to some extent, and it ought not to be put on me to select for them. I admit I am totally incompetent to determine. Then why should I determine it? I believe I am as competent as the Committee on Finance to do it. I believe they have not examined the subject more than I have. They may have had ex parte representations, but that is all they possibly could have. Are we to put this clause in without knowing anything about it? We must trust to the Executive Departments, and if they abuse the trust we shall have somebody to hold responsible. But if we do it ourselves nobody is responsible; the job is completed, the patentee makes money; but probably life is sacrificed, and the object of Congress is defeated.

Mr. POLK. I should like to know one other thing. If there is any gentleman here in favor of Holmes's life-boat, I ask him to tell me whether there is a patent.

Mr. TOOMBS. No doubt of it.

Mr. POLK. If there is, Senators can see at once that it is a monopoly to this man, who, as the Senator from Georgia says, can charge what he pleases.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have no knowledge of it. I never heard of it before; but I have not the least doubt that the only reason it is here is because it is patented.

Mr. POLK. I understand the Senator from New Jersey to state that the men on the Jersey coast, who are engaged in this business, do not want to be confined to this life-boat.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. They have never been consulted, and do not know anything about Mr. Holmes's boat.

Mr. POLK. The judgment of such practical men, at least to me, is the best criterion to be applied to such cases.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know whether it is patented or not; certainly it is not a very large monopoly, for this is confined to twenty-eight boats; but, as I stated before, I have not the slightest feeling about this matter. I am surprised at the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey, because I understood from the statements made in the other House, that this boat was universally approved by the surfmen. This boat, itself, is made of cedar. I understood that they did not like the present boat, and did like this. I leave him, however, to settle that matter with his colleagues and constituents. I only say, as I said before, I do not care a sixpence, except in reference to the public service, whether it is taken or not.

Mr. HUNTER. I am of the same opinion I was originally, that Holmes's name ought to be stricken out, and we ought to leave it to the Department to select the best boat.

Mr. DAVIS. A few years ago we believed—and I am rather inclined still to believe—that the metallic life-boat was the best surf-boat. If we were in error then, I think it is a very fair inference that we are likely to be in error now. Then it was provided that the metallic life-boat should be used upon steamboats. It seemed to be overlooked when it passed Congress, if that was a patent, that it gave a monopoly to the patentee. It was also probably not seen that he had not the ability to furnish one of his life-boats for every steamboat that was required, under the law, to carry one. Here it is true the number is limited. But I waive all questions, and suppose that this is the best boat; let us grant that the committee of the House of Representatives have ascertained that Holmes's life-boat is the best boat for the purpose; it does not follow that it will be the best boat to-morrow. If it is the best boat to-day, it is because something has been found now which is better than that which we had two or three years ago; and why shall we not have another in the course of two or three years hence, better than this? Why may there not be a better to-day, unknown to the committee, supposing this to be the best known to them at this time? I think it wrong to insert the word "Holmes's;" I think it wrong to insert the word "best;" and, but for the fact that no one had alluded to that, I should not have risen at all. The insertion of the word "best," will give the party a right to claim of the Secretary of the Navy that he shall decide among all life-boats by some process which is considered best, and that he shall award the contract to the man who brings that boat. As a measure of economy, I would not subject the Department to the necessity of being driven to the purchase from some one who may be able to establish even that; but striking out the name of the patentee, and striking out the adjective, "best," to give the appropriation to buy life-boats, will, I suppose, answer the purpose.

As for myself, I am against this whole thing. I do not believe it is part of the duty of the Government to establish stations along the coast, any more than it is a part of the duty of the Government to follow particular stage routes and pick up passengers crippled by the upsetting of the stage. It is a subject over which I do not think the General Government ever had legitimate charge. Men incur hazards who go to sea. They incur hazards if they go on railroads or stage coaches, or upon a river; and the hazards of navigating some of our western rivers are probably as great as those of navigating the coast of Jersey. Why, then, shall you not establish stations all along those rivers to pick up people from boats which are snagged, or persons who are crippled by explosions, by which sometimes large numbers of lives are lost?

Mr. MALLORY. It is eminently proper to strike out the word "Holmes's." This life-boat is an improvement upon the ordinary metallic boat—a very great improvement.

Mr. DAVIS. Is it a metallic boat?

Mr. MALLORY. No; it is a cedar boat—an improvement on the metallic boat. It requires less force to propel it through the water. Life-boats are required for various purposes; and for some purposes it would be perhaps the best boat we now have; for others, it would be entirely useless; for example, on the deck of a ship as a buoyant boat to float passengers off. It perhaps has more power than any boat which has been invented; but others will improve upon that. It is a novel model—one that has been thoroughly examined; and it is here. It possesses these qualities in a very eminent degree. But, as for the power of pulling off to a stranded ship against the wind, (for the wind is always against the boat or the ship would not be there,) I contend it has no such power. It would be perfectly impossible for human nature to propel such a boat as the Holmes boat from the shore to a stranded ship, unless you haul it by a line.

Apart from the general impropriety of legislating for a particular man, we know that these things are undergoing improvement every hour; and if you leave this open to all enterprising young men engaged in these researches, you will hold out here a bonus to them to improve on this very boat, and you may get a better one; you will hold out an incentive to the inventor himself to improve on the boat he has already exhibited.

Now, in response to the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi, I will say that the metallic boats are in many respects utter failures. For example, on the part of the coast which I represent—some two hundred and fifty miles—perhaps more strandings of vessels occur, and more disasters to ships, than on any other portion of the coast of the United States. Two metallic boats have been stationed there for the last ten years, and they have never yet been used for any purpose of wreck. It would be impossible; you cannot put men enough in either of those boats to get them off to a wreck in case of storm. A house has been built for them, and they are there at the public expense; and when they have rotted out two more will be supplied, because the constructors and patentees of these boats are always around the Halls of Congress watching where boats are wanted for particular spots, and inducing these appropriations. The provision in the law as to metallic boats originated with the inventor, and not with the wants of commerce. The only life-boat which, upon stormy coasts, is used by practical wreckers when they go off to ships, is the smallest and lightest possible cedar boat that can be built, not over ten or twelve feet long. Only with a small body of that kind can you approach a vessel against the wind. These boats are entirely useless unless for floating. With the method of going off to wrecks, as I understand it, on the coast of New Jersey—that is, throwing from the shore a shell over the ship, attached to a line, by which a hawser is hauled off shore and the boat hauled off—Holmes's life-boat may be the very best for that particular modus operandi; but if you leave out the word "Holmes," he will probably improve on this himself.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Finance Committee was, after line one hundred and thirteen, to insert:

For making the surveys of the confirmed private land claims in California, the surveyor general is hereby authorized to pay such sum as he may deem reasonable, according to the circumstances connected with each case, not exceeding at the rate of twenty five dollars for each mile of the boundary lines of any claim, and also for such lines as may necessarily be run and marked or measured, in order to connect the lines of such claim with those of the adjacent public surveys.

Mr. BRODERICK. I ask the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee what this amendment is for?

Mr. GWIN. I can answer the Senator by the reading of a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, whose recommendation I hold in my hand, approved by the Secretary of the Interior. I send it to the Secretary to be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, April 13, 1858.

SIR: * * * * * The memorialists also think the present rates for the survey of "private land claims" wholly insufficient, they representing that in the discharge of their duties they are frequently compelled to take testimony, occupying time, whilst their expenses are accumulating. They therefore ask, in consideration of the reasons thus assigned, that the present rates for surveying "private land claims" may be increased, and that they be paid for their service as soon as the work has been approved by the surveyor general and the General Land Office, notwithstanding a controversy may arise about the boundaries designated by those surveys, or a protest entered by an adverse claimant.

After a careful consideration of this question respecting the surveys of "private land claims," and in view of the difficulties encountered in this branch of the surveying service, and the importance of securing skillful and faithful deputies, I am of opinion that the maximum of rate allowed by law should be increased, leaving it to the surveyor general to adjust the compensation within that maximum to the difficulties of the survey; and, with your approbation, I recommend a relaxation of the rule, so as to allow payment when the work is approved by the surveyor general, and he sends a certified account, without awaiting adjustment under an appeal or protest entered by an adverse claimant.

In respect to the rule of this office (replied herewith) forbidding deputies from receiving compensation from the party interested in the survey, I have to say that such practice is deemed wholly incompatible with what the Government requires from all its officers in the discharge of their public duties—freedom from bias and from the temptations presented by the exercise of such a privilege.

From a careful consideration of the reasons offered by the deputies, in the memorial in favor of an increase of the price for surveying private land claims in California, I incline to the opinion, and therefore recommend, that the present rate be increased to twenty-five dollars per mile, which will include a maximum rate amply sufficient to afford a generous remuneration to the deputies, including all incidental expenses, and thus secure the service of the most skillful and experienced deputies, an object so much to be desired in the survey of private land claims, and a relaxation of the rule as to payment for approved surveys when conflicts exist, as hereinbefore suggested.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Commissioner.
Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, May 10, 1858.

SIR: I concur in the opinions expressed in your report of the 13th ultimo, upon the memorial from certain deputy surveyors in California, which was submitted to this Department on the 3d of March, through Hon. W. M. Gwin.

* * * * * Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. THOMPSON, Secretary.

To the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. BRODERICK. I am not aware that it is more difficult to make surveys in California than in any other State. I find that there is an appropriation of $100,000 already in this bill, in this clause:

"For surveying the public lands and private land claims in California, including office expenses incident to the survey of claims, and to be disbursed at the rates prescribed by law for the different kinds of work, $100,000."

I would ask my colleague how that money is to be expended; if it is to be given to the surveyor general to expend without making any returns to the General Land Office?

Mr. GWIN. Certainly not. It is for surveying public lands and private land claims. An appropriation has been made in the same terms since the first time the surveys commenced. This is the ordinary appropriation made for every surveyor general in every land district of the United States for surveying public lands and private land claims, all of which is done under the instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. So far as this particular amendment is concerned, I will observe that such a provision was recommended by the former surveyor general and has been recommended by the present surveyor general. It was brought by me before the Senate, at the last session, as soon as I took my seat here. The necessity for it arises partly from the fact that the expenses of fitting out a party to survey private land claims is as great, perhaps, as it is to run township lines and section lines. They are frequently detained a great while. They have to run along meandering streams. If mines are discovered, it takes additional trouble. They have to take testimony as to the boundaries of private land claims in some cases. It has been ascertained that the prices allowed by the present law for the public surveys precludes deputies of capacity from undertaking this service; and heretofore private claimants, in order to have their lands separated from the public lands, have been in the habit of paying a compensation which would justify the deputy surveyors in undertaking the survey of those claims in addition to their pay from Government. The result has been dissatisfaction, arising from an apprehension that deputy surveyors receiving compensation from private owners of lands might be biased so as to run lines in a manner that might be prejudicial to the public interest. It is considered better that there should be sufficient compensation given by Congress to prevent any suspicion from arising in the public mind that deputy surveyors could be influenced in these matters by any other consideration than their duty to the Government and to the people. It has been the practice, from the time we acquired territory in Louisiana up to this hour, to survey the private land claims confirmed by the Government, when the title is finally decided, and the United States have always paid the expense of such surveys, and not put it on the claimants. The appropriation of $100,000 is to be used by the surveyor general in surveying public lands and private land claims in California. This amendment does not increase the appropriation at all, it merely directs the rate at which a portion of the service may be paid for. Heretofore, until within the last few years, the appropriation has been $300,000.

Mr. BRODERICK. I am opposed to the additional appropriation. I cannot see that it is required. The surveyors in California are very well paid. I never heard any complaint before that they were not well paid. I have known surveyors there to make a very large sum of money. One surveyor, I recollect, made some $40,000 out of seven months' work, under a contract with the former surveyor general, Mr. Hays. I hope this additional appropriation will not be made.

Mr. GWIN. This is asked for by every deputy surveyor in California, by the surveyor general, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office—who is very close about such matters—and by the Secretary of the Interior. I am perfectly satisfied that it will aid in separating the private land claims from the public lands in California, and therefore be beneficial. But for this, I should not have asked for it, because I do not want anything appropriated for California that is not necessary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was opposed to this amendment, as a member of the Committee on Finance, because I was not satisfied, from any evidence I saw, that it was expedient to put it in the bill; and since I find that the two Senators from California disagree upon the subject, certainly there is additional ground to doubt its expediency. The Senate will recollect that, at this very session, we have been called upon to pay $250,000 which the surveyor general of California had spent, without authority of law, over and above the amount that was appropriated by Congress for surveys there. That item was put in the deficiency bill, and we paid the money. The argument was, that obligations had been incurred, that the money was due to honest men, who had performed the service, and that we must pay it. Now what appears? The bill appropriates $100,000 for this service generally in California. The rate, as I understand, is fixed by law at fifteen dollars a mile, for good and bad as it comes, hard and easy; and this has been found to be sufficient. There has been no complaint, that I have ever heard of, that it was not a sufficient allowance. This proposition is to allow the surveyor general of California, at his discretion, to pay twenty-five dollars a mile, instead of fifteen dollars, for these private surveys. Every one can see that, that being so, it abstracts just so much from the amount of the appropriation for public surveys, and consequently from the service to be performed. On what is this founded? Representations of the deputy surveyors themselves that they ought to have more pay; and on these representations and their petition, urged and backed up by the senior Senator from California, the Commissioner of the General Land Office says he inclines to the opinion—that is his expression—that the price had better be enlarged; and then the Secretary of the Interior adds a letter that he sustains the inclination of opinion of the Commissioner. Of course, he knows nothing about it, except from the statements of the Commissioner. That being so, and the junior Senator from California stating that there is no greater difficulty, as a general rule, in running lines in California than anywhere else, there does not seem to me to be any good reason for us, on such loose declarations, to increase this allowance to nearly double the usual amount for running out the private claims. If the gentlemen employed in this service are all so honest and upright, such men of integrity as we are told they are, I see no very great difficulty in allowing, if it is necessary, the private claimants to pay part of the expense. It is always the case between individuals, that such expense is shared, and I do not believe any very great harm would come, in individual cases, in allowing that to be done still. I was opposed to the item originally, because I did not see any sufficient evidence on which to sustain it; and I am still more opposed to it when I find that the two Senators from California differ entirely as to its necessity. It is only putting ourselves in the same position again to spend more money, and to be called on to make up deficiencies in California at a very large rate.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator from Maine intimates that it is by my importunities that this recommendation has come before the Senate, and that it is on no other recommendation than that of the deputy surveyors. Why, sir, if he had paid some attention to the discussion that took place here before, and if he had also looked at the history of the legislation of the last Congress, he would have seen that this proposition was advocated by the past and present surveyor general. It was brought before the Senate by me on a memorial of the last surveyor general, during the last session of Congress. A bill was then introduced by me and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, increasing this compensation. It was submitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the Secretary of the Interior, and they reported against it; but after a thorough examination, subsequently, into the question, they have now recommended it; the very thing they reported against last year. The cause of its coming up now, and being here prominent, originates from the fact that the late Attorney General, Mr. Cushing, when he went out of office dismissed a vast number of the appeals in private land claim cases. The whole object is to give a discretion to the surveyor general, so that he can have those claims summarily surveyed, so as to separate them from the public lands, and have them patented at once; for there is nothing that has inflicted greater injury on the people of California than the want of knowledge of the line of the private land claims, and the sooner they are patented the better for the whole country. My object is to give this discretion simply on the recommendation of all the proper officers. My knowledge of the subject is entirely derived from the information I have received from those officers.

Mr. BRODERICK. Fifteen dollars a mile, I believe, has been allowed to surveyors in California, for the last five years, for all surveys made. The price of living is much lower now than it was four or five years since—I think seventy-five per cent. lower. We live in California now as cheap as we can live here. I find everything here as high as I found it in California before I left; and I can see no necessity for appropriating an additional sum for the purpose of paying surveyors there. You will find plenty of them there willing to work for the amount provided in the law, without this additional allowance now proposed to be made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I find that the original bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, contains an appropriation of $100,000 for surveying the public and private land claims in California, which is the precise amount of the estimate from the Department. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the estimates of appropriations required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, recommends an appropriation of $100,000 for this purpose, and that is the precise sum which is embraced in the original bill, without this amendment. It seems that the Commissioner of Public Lands, and the Secretary of the Interior, when they made out their estimates, did not consider that anything more was necessary. The original bill provides the amount they estimated; and I do not see why this discretionary power should now be given to the surveyor general in California, to pay a larger amount than was asked for in the estimates of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, founded, of course, upon information derived from the officers in California. I do not think there is anything in the conduct of the surveyor general whom we have had in California, who has run the Government in debt more than two hundred thousand dollars, without authority, that should particularly commend him to the favorable consideration of Congress, or require a special act giving him a discretion in the disbursement of money. I am opposed to the amendment, and I hope it will not prevail.

Mr. GWIN. It is not intended for the benefit of any person but those who have private land claims in California, which have been dismissed from the Supreme Court of the United States. They want those claims separated from the public domain, and it has been decided by the Secretary of the Interior that they shall not contribute a cent from their own private means to separate their lands from the public lands, define their boundaries, and get their patents. The question is simply whether or not the surveyor general can employ competent surveyors to survey the private land claims at the present prices. If so, he will not exceed them. The experience of both the surveyors general, the past and the present one, is that they cannot. They have therefore employed deputy surveyors at increased rates to survey these claims, and up to this time they have been surveyed principally in that way. It is now determined by the Secretary of the Interior, and for good reasons, that they shall be paid only by the Government of the United States, in order that they shall be entirely free from any bias by getting compensation from private claimants. The only object in asking this authority is to give that kind of discretion which is considered to be needful by the proper officers, to allow additional compensation if it is necessary to do so, for surveying the private land claims. We want to get them entirely out of controversy, and have patents issued for them as rapidly as possible. As far as I am concerned, I am perfectly confident that the power asked for will not be abused; and I believe it will facilitate the surveying of the private land claims, and their being patented by the General Government.

Mr. BRODERICK. My colleague need have no fears about the surveyors receiving compensation from the owners of private land claims. That will be a matter between the private owners and the surveyors; the Government will not find out anything about it. If these land owners are anxious to have their surveys made, they can compensate the surveyors and it can be a matter of business between them and the surveyor, and no one else will know anything about it. I hope this appropriation will not be made.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the finance committee was to strike out the lines one hundred and twenty-five, one hundred and twenty-six, and one hundred and twenty seven, in these words:

"For continuing the survey of the base, meridian, correction parallels, township and section lines, in the Territory of Utah, at augmented rates, $15,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from the item for the collection of agricultural statistics, &c., the following proviso:

"And provided also, That no salary or compensation to any person for services in collecting or distributing seeds, cuttings, and so forth, shall be paid out of this appropriation."

Mr. PUGH. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance why this proviso should be stricken out? I should think it was quite enough for us to buy all these seeds and cuttings, without having officers salaried for the purpose of collecting and distributing them.

Mr. HUNTER. If you keep in the appropriation for collecting seeds and distributing them, you must have somebody to distribute them or they will accumulate in the Patent Office.

Mr. PUGH. It was supposed there were persons enough employed in the Patent Office to do this business.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator can prove that, then there would be no necessity for striking out the proviso. I have no objection to striking out the whole appropriation.

Mr. ALLEN. For several years I was chairman of the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate; and I had frequent occasion to consult with Mr. Browne, who has care of this department in the Patent Office. I certainly think he requires great aid to distribute the various seeds and plants committed to his care. If we get the seeds there, we must certainly deliver them out to some one, or they must rot in the Department.

Mr. PUGH. I do not care much about the proviso; but I wish to know whether it would be in order for me to move to strike out the entire appropriation. ["Certainly."] If so, I move to strike out from the one hundred and forty-first to the one hundred and fifty-third lines of the bill, inclusive.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not think the Senator wants to keep in the proviso. His object is to strike out the whole clause.

Mr. PUGH. Let us take the question on the proviso; and then on striking out the whole clause.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. I now move to strike out from lines one hundred and forty-one to one hundred and fifty-three, inclusive—in these words:

"For collection of agricultural statistics, investigations for promoting agriculture and rural economy, and the procurement of cuttings and seeds, $50,000: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Patents to submit to the Secretary of the Interior, at the commencement of each session of Congress, the invoices of seeds and cuttings purchased with the money hereby appropriated; and also a statement of expenses in procuring agricultural statistics, and incidental expenses in procuring seeds, cuttings, and information."

I only desire to say a word or two. If this is the day of economy, as we have heard so often in this Chamber, I should like to know on what pretext an appropriation of $50,000 can be vindicated for buying all this trash that is furnished us at every session. It takes up the time of members of Congress, it loads down the mails, it increases the expenses of the Government, not merely in the sum named, but in the inordinate appropriation for the service of the Post Office Department. There is no use in it; it is of no benefit to the public at large. Only a few persons at every post office get these seeds. In my judgment it is an extravagant waste of public money. I hope the Senate will strike it out; at all events, I demand the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. HUNTER. I quite concur with the Senator from Ohio, and I will vote with him with pleasure. We acquiesced in the amendment because we know it is popular in both Houses, and perhaps popular in the country. He will find that he will get very few votes for his motion; I will be one with him. I think there are even more mischievous results from the appropriation than those he mentions, but probably he will find this the strongest provision in the bill.

Mr. GREEN. I shall be one of them. That will make three votes at least.

Mr. TOOMBS. Put me in.

Mr. GREEN. It is not only an expense, but it is a public injury. I received certain tobacco seed a few years ago, and I thought it would be accommodating a friend to send it to him. When I got home, the first word said by my old friend was, "you have ruined my crop: I got your seed, I took it for granted, coming from the Patent Office, it must be very fine; I put it in the bed, set out the plants, and it is all little stuff not worth a sixpence." He lost his whole crop. It was fine land, Missouri land, which is not Virginia land. [Laughter.] I hope the appropriation will be stricken out.

Mr. HOUSTON. I shall not vote with the gentlemen who announce their intention to strike out this appropriation. I think it one of the most useful in the bill. I am not one of those who decline the little offices of duty to my constituency; I am anxious to distribute seeds, and to disseminate the best possible that I can obtain. Throughout the State which I represent—and it is not very circumscribed in its limits—persons are writing to me to obtain seeds, of various kinds, from the Patent Office of the United States; announcing to me, in many instances, the excellent products they have had from those they have received on former occasions, and requiring others of a different character. They have husbanded those they have obtained, and distributed them among their neighbors; and their production has been very fine.

In addition to that, persons living remote from the center, where we now are, have not an opportunity of obtaining them through any other medium than the Government. The distribution of seeds, and transporting them, does not incur any additional expense to the Government. The expense is only here. If they incur the mails, that is a matter for the contractors; and they would not agree to abate anything if that branch of agriculture were dispensed with. The contracts for transporting the mail would be as great then as now, I have no doubt; so that, on that ground, there would be no saving.

My honorable friend from Missouri says he ruined a man's crop; and, therefore, the seeds ought not to be distributed, and ought not to be collected, no matter how useful they may generally be. He gives a particular instance in which some man, not understanding the character of the seed he received, or the culture of the plant, or the value of it when produced, thought he was ruined. No doubt, if that man had known how to take care of that tobacco, how to cultivate it, he might have made a fortune by it. There are some persons in eastern Texas I know that have this year shipped vast quantities of tobacco, and, doubtless, will sell it at two dollars a pound. It is the Cuba tobacco; and, I presume, that is a description not suited to the climate and latitude of Missouri—it being a cold, northern climate; and the distribution of Cuba tobacco seed was a failure in that section of country; but I have no doubt it succeeded in fifty instances where the climate was adapted to it. A man who reasons on the subject, knows that all descriptions of plants are not suited to every variety of climate. That man ascertained by that experiment that the description of seed he had received was not suited to the climate of Missouri; but that does not prove that it was not suited to a southern climate.

My opinion is, that we cannot expend this amount of money to greater advantage for the community at large in any other way we can invest it. At one time there was an attempt made here to put down the Patent Office report. Why, sir, not a day transpires that I do not get applications not only from the State which I represent, but from different parts of the Union, for Patent Office reports, the agricultural part and the mechanical part. In different sections of the country I find the people are anxious for their distribution, so that I really think these two branches of expenditure are the most useful that are made in the country. For that reason, I shall vote against striking out this appropriation, believing as I do that the distribution of seeds and cuttings and yams and various other things that are disseminated through the southern country, is the most beneficial use that can be made of the same amount of money, and the community are more largely benefited by it than by any other expenditure of the Government. I shall therefore vote against striking it out.

Mr. BIGLER. Mr. President, our annual expenditures for the support of the Government, we are told here daily, are running up to sixty or seventy million dollars. Here is a small item for one of the most important branches of industry—$60,000 for the uses of agriculture. I do not propose to inquire how far the distribution of seeds has answered the purpose intended. I know that would be a subject of great controversy, for I am aware that there are serious complaints as to the administration of this department, and that impositions have been practiced in the distribution of seed. But, sir, I do not feel willing to strike down this department, to refuse the appropriations, to leave the machinery standing without the means of carrying it on. If experience has demonstrated that this department of the public service is unnecessary, that it has failed to accomplish the end designed, let us consider that question appropriately, and abolish the office and the officer; but I am not prepared to do that. I think the agricultural interests of this country are entitled to this small pittance, although it may not operate as satisfactorily as had been hoped. I would very willingly agree to a proper inquiry into this subject; to have it fully inquired into, and if it was ascertained that it was unnecessary or unsuccessful, to abolish this branch of the agricultural department; but I do not think it wise to withhold the appropriation while the machinery is allowed to exist. I shall vote to continue the appropriation.

Mr. GREEN. The Senator from Pennsylvania is entirely mistaken, if he supposes there is any such department of the Government. I know of none such. An agricultural department of this Government! When was it organized?

Mr. BIGLER. I did not say an agricultural department.

Mr. GREEN. What then?

Mr. BIGLER. It belongs to the Patent Office.

Mr. GREEN. Where is our right to establish a Patent Office? Because the Constitution says we have a right to give exclusive privileges to discoverers and inventors of useful machines; and on that ground you undertake to establish an agricultural bureau! The proposition has been made in Congress time and again, but always voted down. I know how popular it is to pander to a popular sentiment, and to praise the farmers.

Mr. BIGLER. Will the Senator allow me a moment? Is not this duty performed under a law? Is it not a duty required at the hands of the officers? I say the machinery exists.

Mr. PUGH. This is the only law on the subject. If we leave out the item, there will be no law for it.

Mr. GREEN. I say I am aware of the fact that politicians are apt to suppose that to flatter the mechanics, the farmers, the "mud sills," will be very proper; but, sir, I want this Government confined to its legitimate purposes. It has the right to make property of that thing which, without law, would not be property; and that is to grant an exclusive right to the man who makes a discovery. By natural law it would be no property. The moment he used it and another saw it, the latter could use it also; but by constitutional provision, and by the law of the land, his discovery is made property. There is no other property in the world made property by law. Under this guise, under this limited grant given to stimulate discovery and inventive genius, we are undertaking to build up an agricultural bureau, and then to sustain it vote large appropriations out of the public fund collected of all the people, to do no good, and in violation of the Constitution. I know that Missouri is as much interested in agricultural production as any other State, in proportion to population, and I know it is as much my interest to flatter the people of Missouri as anybody else's; but I will not vote the people of Missouri one dollar when I have not the right to do it. What right have I to furnish their seed-wheat, their seed-corn, and their seed for tobacco, and for hemp and other productions? Is this Government to carry on a large farm, to furnish seed, slips, and cuttings for garden plants, orchards, and nurseries? When the association of States was formed, it was supposed to be a Government to conduct our foreign relations, and nothing in reference to our internal relations except the specific powers specified in the Federal Constitution. We are departing further and further from it every day, I am sorry to see; and we are appealed to because farmers are a popular class, and a meritorious class; and we are appealed to on behalf of mechanics, because they, too, are meritorious.

Sir, all classes of the community are meritorious, and I trust I shall always find it in my heart to love them all alike, not to put one above another because it is a more numerous class, and will give more votes. They are all alike. Each performs his functions in the machinery of society. Each is entitled to honor according to the manner in which he discharges that duty. But let individuals pursue their own avocations; let Government pursue its duty, and confine itself to the performance of that duty; and not buy seed to distribute; or buy machines to distribute. We have the same right to buy machines to give to the factories in the Northeast, as we have to buy seed to give to the farmers, and brood-cattle and horses to give to the stock raisers. It is a departure from the object of the Government; it is a practical violation of the Constitution, which we all ought to support.

I know it is an ungracious task to expose these things; I know it is unpopular to say one word against them. If my popularity depends on pandering to a vitiated taste, I want it to go. I will defend the truth as I understand it; because I know the people well enough to know there is honesty in their heart that will respond to it, and sustain the man who does it. Why, sir, what good does this seed do? None. What harm does it do? It loses crops; it taxes the public to buy them; it taxes the mails to carry them; all of which is a public injury, and a public injury done in violation of the Constitution. I know we have a right to establish a Patent Office, because there is a special, specific power given in the Constitution; but that is to issue letters patent.

It is time for us to cast about us and reflect upon the tendency of congressional action. Under a specific grant of power to particular men who make discoveries and who ought to be protected, and which makes property of that which, without law, would not be property, we have gone on to extend the Patent Office until it is to be a common almoner of the farmers and mechanics of the country. Of the Patent Office report this last year—the last one I have seen, at least, for 1856—three fourths does not pertain to the Patent Office. It is a long history of squirrels, of scorpions, of bats, of vampires; and it, too, is a vampire, sucking the blood of the Treasury. Why is this? What right have we to publish an essay upon quadrupeds, birds, bats, and beasts? Is there any constitutional power to do it? It is a departure from the original purpose for which the Constitution was designed when it said Congress should have power to grant exclusive rights to inventors and discoverers. Some good suggestion may occasionally occur in the Patent Office report, and it would be very strange if it did not; but I should like for any Senator to say whether, out of the five hundred pages, he can find five pages of sensible matter pertaining to the legitimate objects for which the Constitution designed the Patent Office. So with the seed, and so with everything else connected with it.

I exceedingly regret that I have been compelled to enter my protest against it, and I regret it because the public will say, "you are coming in contact with the farmers; you do so much for the mechanics; you do so much for the commercial interests; and why not do something for the farmers?" I am as anxious to do all I can for the farmers as for any other class; but when I have no power to do it, a sensible farmer would not ask me to do it, an honest farmer would not expect me to do it, and I will do no more for any one class than I will do for the farmers, except where there is a special constitutional power and duty incumbent on me, as in the case of inventors. They are entitled to a special protection under the Constitution, to which others are not entitled; and that will apply to the farmer as well as to the mechanic. If he can make a discovery which is useful to his fellow-citizens, he can be protected in it as well as the mechanic. They can all be protected alike. Let us simplify this Patent Office, and bring it down to first principles. Let us throw off all this extraneous matter, and this wasteful expenditure of money; this breaking down of the mail; this destruction of the crops; this heaping up of burdens on the people unnecessarily, and in violation of the Constitution, and come back to the starting point as it was fifteen years ago. Why, sir, fifteen years ago, according to my recollection, the Patent Office report was about ten, fifteen, or thirty pages. As late as 1844 it did not make three hundred pages. In 1856, it was four large volumes, each one numbering at least five hundred pages—two thousand pages of Patent Office report. It is an expense. It is not a benefit. It is a departure from the original purpose as designed by the Constitution; and I hope, therefore, this proposition will prevail.

Mr. WILSON. I shall vote for the motion made by the Senator from Ohio. This is a proposition to appropriate $60,000 for the purchase of seeds, which amounts to about two hundred dollars for each member of the Senate and House of Representatives. Last year, I think we appropriated seventy or seventy-five thousand dollars, amounting to nearly two hundred and fifty dollars a piece; and, I venture to say, we can buy for five dollars all the seeds each member receives. I think we ought to do all we can to cut down this matter of distributing seeds and documents. The members of Congress have become simple agents for the distribution of seeds and documents in the country; and it is a tax on our time, which prevents us from devoting hours that we ought to devote to the reading of the bills and the papers necessary to give intelligent votes in Congress. I believe the country receives no benefit from all this vast outlay. I shall vote on all occasions to cut this matter down, and to keep it out of Congress.

Mr. IVERSON. But two Senators upon this floor have advocated this appropriation of $60,000. One is the Senator from Texas, [Mr. HUSTON,] and the other the Senator from Pennsylvania, on this side of the Chamber, [Mr. BIGLER.] Now, sir, the Senator from Texas, I believe, does not claim to be a member of the Democratic party. In fact, I do not know what party he does claim to belong to. I think he is rather a sort of mongrel politician, and it is very difficult to classify him. He goes for about anything and everything that suits his own discretion and taste; and his taste is generally very correct. He can advocate this thing and that thing and the other and anything he chooses without being inconsistent, so far as regards his political principles, because I do not understand that he professes any political principles. But the Senator from Pennsylvania, within the sound of my voice—he is not in his seat, but I should like him to come in because I want to catechise him for a moment—professes to belong to the Democratic party; at least he is a member of the Democratic organization; and the cardinal principle of that party, if I understand it, is, that Congress can exercise no power, except the power be granted in the Constitution, or it be necessary and proper in order to carry out some specific grant.

Now, sir, I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania for a little information. I am a mere tyro in politics, and he is a very experienced and distinguished man. I desire him to point out to me the clause in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to expend money to buy seed for the planters. I ask for information; because if there is such a clause, I have never been able to discover it. Perhaps the greater acuteness of that Senator may have enabled him to discover the clause which authorizes this appropriation. I wish to be informed; I am a scholar ready to receive information. I want the Senator to point out to me the clause in the Constitution of the United States which authorizes the expenditure of money out of the public Treasury to buy seeds to distribute to the planters of this country, or to buy any other property for general distribution. The Senator, like myself, went to that desk, when he was introduced into this body, and took a solemn oath to observe the Constitution of the United States. This is a Government of limited powers. It can exercise no power except that which is specifically granted. Now, sir, I want that Senator to answer me, how he reconciles it to his conscience, as an honorable and honest man, to vote for such a proposition as this? He is a member of the Democratic party; the cardinal feature of that party is, that this power cannot be exercised; and yet he votes for it.

Sir, it is said that that Senator is the "right bower," speaking in common parlance [laughter]—I mean in gambler's phrase—of a Democratic Executive. Well, sir, I should be very sorry to think that the present Democratic Executive would vote appropriations of this sort, or sanction them. If he would, then he is not the Democrat I take him to be; he is not the Democrat I took him to be when I voted for him. If he is that fishy Democrat that might be inferred from such a proposition as this, I would not vote for him again. There are a great many Democrats, in the northern States especially, who go off upon these large constructive powers of the Government. The Senator from Pennsylvania and others, sometimes vote for internal improvements. How do they arrive at it? According to the interpolation of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EVERTS,] yesterday or the day before, the power "to regulate commerce" is a power to regulate and protect commerce. It was very well for the Senator from Ohio to inject the word "protect" into the Constitution, but I do not think it is there. He called it the power to regulate and protect commerce, and that authorizes Congress to build piers and dredge out rivers and harbors, and appropriate millions to the construction of those works! The Constitution contains no such word as "to protect" commerce. It is "to regulate commerce," and that is altogether a different phrase, meaning a very different thing. "To regulate" is to establish rules by which commerce shall be controlled and directed—not that you shall facilitate, improve, enlarge it, increase it. That is not to regulate—that is to protect according to the constitutional construction of the Senator from Ohio.

But, sir, where in the Constitution of the United States do we get the power to distribute seeds throughout the country? Nowhere, according to my reading of that instrument. It is a positive, unequivocal, gross violation of the Constitution of the United States; and I do not see how any man, in consistency with his own conscience, can vote for it. Especially I do not see how a Democrat, a man who has been all his life professing Democratic principles, can in this way violate the Constitution and the cardinal features and principles of the Democratic party. This, to be sure, is not a very large sum. The Senator from Pennsylvania says this is a small sum; and he is not willing to cut out this small appropriation because it does not enter into the large expenditures of this Government, about which so much complaint has been made. I commend to the Senator the old Scotch proverb, "that many mickles make a muckle;" and if we shall cut out this little appropriation here, and that little appropriation there, and so on here, there, and everywhere, we shall reduce the expenditures to something like a reasonable amount. It is these small items which creep into the appropriation bills, that swell the expenditures of the Government, and make the foundation and give the license for larger and more extravagant expenditures in violation of the Constitution and the true intention of the Government.

Apart, however, from any constitutional question, so far as the appropriation for the distribution of seeds is concerned, I do not believe it does a particle of good. The Senator from Missouri has stated a case where the distribution of seeds from the Patent Office injured one of his friends. I remember to have heard several years ago of a Representative from the State of Tennessee who received some of these Patent Office seeds marked with a "highfalutin" botanical name, and he sent them all over his district supposing they were something extremely valuable, and the planters planted them supposing them to be something very extraordinary and recherché; but in course of time there came up some noxious weeds that destroyed not only their crops but their land, and the man lost his election the next time, because he had introduced these things into his district. Now I hope and trust that if this appropriation is passed, every man that votes for it will lose his election, including the Senator from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

What seeds are sent to us to distribute to our constituents? Every man here knows from personal experience what they are—cabbages and turnips and onions and beets and those things which are in the possession of every housewife in the United States. There is not a woman in my country that does not raise these things herself, or that would turn upon her heel to thank you for the seed you might distribute to her. And what are they worth? As the Senator from Massachusetts has very properly remarked, we are appropriating $60,000 to purchase seeds for distribution, when five dollars would be a liberal equivalent for all the seeds that any Senator or any member of the House of Representatives receives. They are sent to me in boxes, and it gives infinite trouble and labor to distribute them, because I have to select out from amongst one hundred thousand people in the State of Georgia, those to whom I shall send them. It is not an easy task, sir, and I do not think I gain any popularity by it. Now and then I may get a man to thank me for giving him some seeds—a few papers of cabbage or turnip seeds or onion seed or something of that sort, which can be bought in the seed shops all over the United States, for five cents or six and a quarter cents a paper, in great abundance. Indeed, if you go into the country, the old women will give them to you, and supply their neighbors without stint and without price. But these are the kinds of seed we get from the Patent Office to distribute. They have got an agent traveling all over Europe for the purpose of getting seeds. It is but an appropriation to feed a few hungry office-holders. That is the sum and substance of it. It is to feed a few officers, clerks, and others in this so-called bureau of agriculture, in the Patent Office. It is to give them the means of living luxuriously in the city of Washington. Sir, I am not willing to take the money of my constituents out of their pockets for the purpose of feeding, in the city of Washington, these men who live upon the bounty of Government. I do not believe the distribution of these seeds is valuable to any portion of the community. It is a rare exception when anything is distributed that brings the least value to the country.

Believing that the whole system is rotten, that it is not in conformity with the Constitution, I shall vote cheerfully to strike out this appropriation. It was only last session that we appropriated, I think, $25,000, or perhaps a larger sum—I do not remember the precise amount, but it was very large—to be invested in sugar-cane for the planters of Louisiana. An agent was sent down to South America to buy the plants, and the twenty-five, thirty, or fifty thousand dollars, or whatever the amount was which was appropriated, was expended, and he brought back two cargoes of plants which, when they got to New Orleans, were not worth a button. They were all rotten, all decayed, and the money that we appropriated had no other effect than to give Mr. Glover a very agreeable, pleasant trip to South America and back in one of the national ships. That is the character of these expenditures generally. They result in no good; they do not give any popularity to Senators and Representatives—at least I do not think they have ever affected me in that way; and I doubt very much whether the Senator from Pennsylvania has acquired any substantial addition to his fame and reputation by this distribution. I hope the appropriation will be stricken out.

Mr. BIGLER. I have not been in the habit, sir, if I understand myself at all, of regulating my action by reference to popularity. I think I can repel that charge with about as much safety as my honorable friend from Georgia. The question that occupied this country for four long months of this session may have been or may not have been a question of popularity for the Senator from Georgia; it was a question in which that honorable Senator felt deeply interested, because his constituents were interested. Sir, if I had feared popular feeling, I should not have stood by that honorable Senator on that question. When the Senator from Georgia shall have met what northern Senators and northern Democrats have met year after year, in struggling for the constitutional rights of his people, then he may be at liberty to talk about the responsibility of voting for or against garden seeds, radish seeds, turnip seeds, onions, cabbages, and sugar-cane. [Laughter.] Why, Mr. President, no man would suppose that the honorable Senator could be so excited about sugar-cane and onions. [Laughter.] It is scarcely generous in the Senator to rise here and catechise an inexperienced member like myself, on a great constitutional question—the question whether onion seeds have been constitutionally sent abroad. [Laughter.]

The Patent Office is constitutionally established, because the Constitution says such a department shall be established. I spoke of this distribution of seeds as a part of the practice in that department, as the agricultural and mechanical reports are a part of the practice. If it be unwise, as I said before, if it be an abuse of the proper purpose of that department, let that fact be inquired into, and I am as ready as the Senator to vote to correct the error. But, sir, when did we begin? The honorable Senator has the advantage of me, for I have not had time to examine the records; but somehow or other I am strongly inclined to believe I should find that Senator voting for these seeds at some time or other.

Mr. IVERSON. No.

Mr. BIGLER. Very well, sir. He appeals to me on the solemnity of my oath. He says, that like him, I took an oath here to sustain the Constitution, and if I vote for these seeds to the people of Pennsylvania, I shall have done violence to my conscience. [Laughter.] I am not going to do any such thing. I am going to vote for the seeds conscientiously. [Renewed laughter.]

But, sir, I am not willing that garden and onion seeds and garlic shall be a test of Democratic faith. [Laughter.] We have understood it otherwise in the North. Northern Democrats, Mr. President, are as sound on those great principles which underlie and sustain our institutions as are our southern friends. Now, sir, an honest confession: the best of you, when a question comes before this body, which involves the interests and feelings of your constituents, and your chances for office, are very liable to construe the Constitution with some facility. When northern Republicans tell the Senator from Georgia, that the rendition of fugitive slaves is not constitutional, he does not believe it—nor do I. When they tell him that the Constitution does not protect the institution of slavery in the Territories, he does not believe them—nor do I; but there are men who vote here conscientiously, who differ with him on these points.

But, sir, enough of that. What I am going to say is this: that if it be so that a vote for these garden seeds is to demoralize the Constitution, is in derogation of the Constitution, then it has been so broken up that it is scarce worth saving at all. The honorable Senator from Georgia has sat here silent in his seat year after year, and witnessed the derogation of the Constitution on this seed question, [laughter,] without ever opening his mouth; and when he finds an humble representative of the agriculturists, does he catechise him about the question of seeds and onions? No; but he brings his constitutional question. He knew very well that I could show no express authority in the Constitution for any such service. I do not know when this practice began; but I do know that it has been indulged in for many years. These appropriations, if my recollection serves me, were made by the last Congress, and passed with scarcely any division at all.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator is mistaken. I moved to strike it out both sessions of the last Congress, and the vote was taken by yeas and nays each time.

Mr. BIGLER. Very well; that may be so. What I suggest is, that the vote for it was very large. Why, sir, my honorable friend from Virginia was so satisfied that he could not strike out these seeds, that his face bore the appearance of despair. He had had a great deal of experience in it. He told us at once that the other branch would not yield it, and this body would not yield it; and, therefore, I was under the impression that it had been a very decided sentiment. My recollection is, that it was sustained in the last Congress by a very large vote. What I say now to my aged friend from Georgia [laughter] is, that if he will sit here, year after year, and allow an improper, unwise, and unconstitutional practice to be indulged in, it is scarcely generous in him to call me to so severe account so early in the morning. [Laughter.]

Mr. IVERSON. I have been waiting, of course, upon the experience of the Senator from Pennsylvania to lead off in all these cases; but the Senator is mistaken; I not only voted against the appropriation two years ago, but made a few remarks against it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was very much astonished, Mr. President, at the assault made upon me by my friend from Georgia—I will not say my venerable, but I will say my juvenile friend. I admit that speaking is very unnecessary on the present occasion, and I dislike to interfere in this matter, for it is a very pretty quarrel as it stands, between those two Democratic gentlemen. [Laughter.] The Senator from Georgia says that I belong to no party. Well, sir, that is a great convenience, because there is no dissension in my party. I am perfectly accordant with myself. I heard the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] yesterday, complain of a breaking up—a split among the Democracy on certain questions. I have no complaint of that kind to make in regard to my party—I am a unit. [Laughter.] I have no dissensions whatever with myself. I try to keep my conscience as void as possible of offense, and therefore I always feel strong in the faith that I am right. But really it seems to me strange that such a violent philippic should have been delivered by the honorable Senator from Georgia against the distribution of seeds and other conveniences to the public, and that the Senator from Missouri should talk as if it were catering for popularity on this occasion; that we were advocating the interests of the farmers or of the mechanics. I mentioned neither farmers nor mechanics. The seeds that I have been distributing generally have not been for farming purposes, but for culinary and garden purposes. The Senator from Georgia arraigns me, too, for my gallantry to the ladies, in endeavoring to contribute to their convenience and to the supply of their tables—their vegetable wants. I do not believe this is any evidence of catering on my part for popularity, for it is pretty well understood that, if I have been catering for it, I have not been so fortunate as to secure it, at least at home; and I have no aspirations upon the face of the earth at this time, in advocating this measure, but to contribute to the general comfort of the families of the country, whether they have votes to give or votes to withhold. I believe I would prefer sending seeds to the widows rather than to those who had husbands to procure for them these necessary vegetable conveniences. [Laughter.] I have no disposition at all to cater for popularity. This I deem a higher, holier object than that. I would not seek popularity if I could command it or win it by bowing and cringing to popular favor or popular caprice. Sir, it should follow in my wake; it should be marshaled in my rear; I would lead its advance; I would never go cringing and bowing to obtain its smiles. I never sought popularity thus, and I never will.

But, sir, I cannot perceive how popularity would be won in this way. It is a trifling matter, so far as we are concerned; but I find that gentlemen deem it a matter of interference with their personal convenience, because the proper distribution of these seeds occupies time and attention. I have never devoted so much time heretofore as I have at this session to this duty, because I have had very many solicitations for these seeds that I have desired to comply with. I have not only been written to for them from my own State, but even from the State of Maine; and I was anxious to comply with the requests of my friends who sent for them. I considered the sacrifice on my part as very little, compared to the rational gratification of the desires of persons who wished to obtain them; and therefore I cheerfully complied, although it took a little time. I am not a fashionable man, who, when the Senate is not sitting, wish to occupy all my time at parties, smiling and bowing, and making my devoirs to the ladies. I have attained to that period of life when my notions are becoming like myself—a little old-fashioned; and I have not the facilities and attractions I might have formerly possessed, and that other gentlemen now possess, offering strong inducements to enter into competition with the gay and the gallant, and therefore I can devote time to this purpose.

It has been repeated again that these seeds incur the mails. I think that is a mistake. The contractor is bound to carry what is put in the mail, and he obtains no additional price for anything that is put in. He has to comply with his contract, by transporting what is given to him to carry, under a specific contract, without any contingent additional expenses to the Government.

I shall not now investigate the constitutionality of these expenditures. When I came here under a Democratic Administration, I found the custom existing in Washington at that time, as well as I recollect. I then commenced the distribution of these seeds, and I have continued it up to the present time. Never before do I recollect having heard a complaint that it was unconstitutional. In fact, sir, I never knew that it was an article of the Democratic faith to adhere to the Constitution in all circumstances. I thought they had repudiated the Constitution, substituting therefor a principle which I have never yet fallen into; and every four years they reestablish a principle that I do not see recognized in the Constitution; at least, it is not specifically authorized—I mean the platform system. That is now adopted, and it has been adopted within my recollection, and not a great many years since. It met the direct disapprobation of a man whose memory will be sacred with every Democrat that lives upon the earth, ay more, sacred with every patriot—I mean Jackson. Was he ever nominated by a caucus? Was he nominated by a convention? No; but he indignantly spurned the offer when they wanted him to go into the first convention at Baltimore. It had his brand upon it, burned as upon the front of Cain by the Almighty wrath. Yet that is the doctrine now, and that is the text-book of the Democratic party. I have not quit Democracy; I am still a Democrat; but I am not a Democrat of platform principles. The present so-called Democratic party pursues the routine of platforms, ignoring the Constitution. The Constitution is the text, but the platforms are the context. They lug in sectional issues, try to reconcile conflicting interests, and clip the great wings of party so that it cannot fly, but goes hobbling along, left to reach its destiny as it may. I repel the charge that I am not a Democrat in principle; and I challenge any gentleman to come forward and put his finger upon a sentiment I have ever uttered, or a principle that I have ever avowed, that is not in accordance with Democracy. I have never departed from it; and if other gentlemen have indulged in slight aberrations, it is no business of mine; they are not accountable to me, nor am I accountable to them.

Sir, these seeds have sprouted. When they will finish growing, I cannot tell. There is a very important branch of them, that my friend from Georgia did not think of—the ruta-baga turnip. That is a very important turnip, [laughter,] and I have not seen anything so much in demand as that vegetable. It is most excellent; it is not only productive, but it is delicate and remarkably fine. That and the garlic, and other species of seeds, are all very well received, and I am still for sending them forth, unless the honorable Senator will convince me that it is unconstitutional. I find opposed to him on that point a gentleman for whom I have a very great respect—the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, who I believe is a staunch Democrat; one who tells us that he has stood up in support of southern Democracy with great fidelity, and I believe with some adventure and great sacrifice; even sometimes of personal inclination. [Laughter.] He thinks it is constitutional. I have as good a right to rely upon his constitutional opinion as upon those of the Senator from Georgia. I have great respect for Georgia; but I must have some for the Keystone State. They both are members of the old thirteen; and I admit that the people I represent are but youngers in comparison with the citizens of the older States. Georgia, on the Atlantic seaboard, where commerce is abundant, where they are surrounded by intelligent communities, has great advantages that a new country has not—like Texas, on the frontier, where little settlements are removed, as El Paso is, six or eight hundred miles from the main body of the people. There they have not the facilities they have in Georgia. The people of Georgia are an educated people; they have every advantage possible; every commercial facility to obtain those things which can only reach, by extraordinary means, the remote verges of civilization in the United States, through the medium of Senators and Representatives. Hence it is that I feel it my duty to do whatever I think will contribute to their comforts; to their advantages, to supply the defects that exist in their peculiar situation; and I know no means of more readily attaining that object than by distributing information on the subject of agriculture, through the Patent Office reports, and at the same time distributing such rare seeds as may be convenient and useful to them.

In the ordinary course of things, without the facilities furnished by the Government, how long would it have taken the Chinese sugar-cane to reach the remotest verge of Texas, where it is now flourishing, and where vast quantities of molasses are made from it, and not less than fifty or sixty acres are now cultivated by a single planter, who, a few years ago, had to transport his sugar several hundred miles, and pay duties upon it? That is being perfected there as one of the grand productions of the country, and it has affected the distribution of comforts that could not have reached them without great expense for years and years to come; and in portions of the country where the indigenous cane of America could not be cultivated, and could not be productive. These are some of the advantages we have derived. Again, corn has been introduced into that country from the Patent Office that is productive beyond all former example; not only that, but every variety of wheat thrown upon a soil the most productive on earth. Our soil will produce from thirty to fifty bushels of wheat, per acre. Our whole country, from latitude 31° to 36°, is adapted to the culture of wheat, cotton, and other products that are rare in other portions of the Union. Our staple crop there has been benefited and improved by the distribution of seeds obtained from the Patent Office. Cotton seed has been introduced of peculiar and productive character; and that is an improvement to our agricultural interests.

Sir, I have not urged this as any peculiar benefit to the farmer; but when we look at his position, ought we not to have some regard for him? All others are dependent upon him. Strike him out, and how are you to supply the world with the materials of life, or the breadstuffs necessary to existence? When he is employed, he contributes more or less to the support of all others, besides furnishing them the reliable staff of life upon which to lean.

Thus it is, Mr. President, that I am prepared to support this appropriation with constancy and unyielding will, submitting to nothing but to the voice of a majority of this House. I never will surrender the privilege of my people in this respect; for it has been adopted by gentlemen as capable of construing the Constitution as Senators around me are—adopted by them unchallenged. It has grown into a useful branch of the Government, and I am prepared to support it so long as it is useful; and I stand on this floor to advocate it as intimately connected with the general interests of the country; with the agricultural, the mechanical, and, if you please, the professional, at least the culinary interests of the country. I believe that of all the means of distributing our public money, when we have any to distribute, it is the most rational and most beneficial to the general interests of the country.

Mr. BIGLER. I shall pursue this subject for but a moment longer. The Senator from Georgia, I have no doubt, is satisfied that he found me entirely in fault: as to the question of constitutional authority, and as I could not find the word "seeds" in the Constitution, my Democracy seemed to be in danger. In the extremity, I am indebted to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Johnson] for the best authority on this subject that I suppose can be found, and on that authority I am willing to rest this proposition. The authority from which I propose to read, is the eighth annual message of George Washington—pretty good authority in this country on all great questions, as a patriot and a statesman. This message almost describes the institution now in existence, of which we have heard such violent complaint today. It says:

"It will not be doubted that, with reference either to individual or national welfare, agriculture is of primary importance. In proportion as nations advance in population, and other circumstances of manly, this truth becomes more apparent, and renders the cultivation of the soil more and more an object of public patronage. Institutions for promoting it grow up, supported by the public purse. Among the means which have been employed to this end, none have been attended with greater success than the establishment of boards, composed of proper characters, charged with collecting and diffusing information; and enabled, by premiums and small pecuniary aids, to encourage and assist a spirit of discovery and improvement. This species of establishment contributes doubly to the increase of improvement, by stimulating to enterprise and experiment, and by drawing to a common center the results, everywhere, of individual skill and observation, and spreading them thence over the whole nation. Experience, accordingly, has shown that they are very cheap instruments of immense national benefits."

"I have heretofore proposed, to the consideration of Congress, the expediency of establishing a national university; and, also, a military academy. The desirableness of both these institutions has so constantly increased with every new view I have taken of the subject, that I cannot omit the opportunity of, once for all, recalling your attention to them. The assembly to which I address myself is too enlightened not to be fully sensible how much a flourishing state of the arts and sciences contributes to national prosperity and reputation."

Now, Mr. President, I shall not follow this subject by any extended remarks; the question has been fully discussed; but I wanted to settle the point of authority, to some extent of Democracy, with my friend from Georgia. It would seem that I am attached to an institution which the Senator is under impression is very favorably regarded by my constituents, and that I must sustain it in order to have popular favor. He has an institution peculiarly agreeable to his people in his part of the country. The best authority I could get was the opinion and advice of George Washington; I agree that his favorite institution has its recognition and support in the Constitution. The difference is, that mine is an institution for distributing seeds to promote agriculture, and his an institution for the distributing of "niggers." With the distribution of the seeds, the whole work has been performed, but in his case the great trouble is to gather them up again. I have assisted as far as my humble influence would go in the North, to perform that work of gathering up the offspring of this institution, to which my friend from Georgia is in no way improperly attached, because I agree that it springs from the Constitution. I have exercised what influence I could in the North in returning what he or his favorite institution has distributed throughout the country. But I shall dismiss the subject. I am perfectly aware that much that the Senator from Georgia said was not at all serious, and certainly no part of it was intended offensively.

Mr. HALE. It is very rarely, sir, that a debate in the Senate is intended to influence the action of members here, but it is made to enlighten the country. I confess, however, that this debate has enlightened my mind. I was at first inclined to go against this appropriation, but the considerations which have been urged with so much force by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I confess, have weakened my convictions in that direction, and have almost induced me to go for it. If the appeal which he so powerfully and pathetically made to the honorable Senator from Georgia has not moved him, he must be impervious to eloquence and to pathos.

I think that the case which the Senator from Pennsylvania has presented is eminently just. I agree entirely with what he says, when he declares that in his course here he has not been looking to popularity. I think that the whole North, Pennsylvania no less than any other part of the Union, will indorse his veracity, if nothing else, when he declares that he has not been seeking popularity; and when he appeals to the Senator from Georgia, and tells him what a hard road the northern Democrats have had to travel, how much they have had to sacrifice and to face; and then asks if, in return for all this, he cannot let him have a few onion and garlic seeds, [laughter.] I confess if the Senator from Georgia was not moved, I was. [Laughter.] I think it is reasonable, and more than reasonable, even if he had asked for a little of the vegetable full grown. But when he says: "Look at the North, and see on every side, and hear by every mail, proof that we have not pandered to popularity; see what we have suffered in your behalf; when you see all that, and see that we are not exorbitant, we do not ask any offices; take your foreign missions, and distribute them where they appropriately belong; take the Federal Treasury, and use it; but when we go home to an outraged constituency, will you be so illiberal as not to let us carry a few onion seeds, a little garlic, and now and then a cabbage, [laughter,] so that our constituency may be inclined to wink a little at the course we have taken on this great question, upon which we have sacrificed so much for you?" I confess that even if I had such strict rules as the Senator from Georgia entertains upon the Constitution, when such an appeal as that came from such a source, the "right bower" of the Administration, not asking to take the "ace," or anything else, but simply a little onion seed—a vegetable that, under peculiar states of application, is calculated to produce tears—[laughter]—cannot you let us go home and cry with our constituents over what we have done? I do not want to be personal, but I appeal to the honorable Senator from Georgia, and I ask him—I can ask him, for we have always been on friendly relations—

Mr. BIGLER. Allow me. I have no idea at all that the Senator intends to be personal.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no.

Mr. BIGLER. But he uses terms which I do not understand; talking about the "right bower" and "ace," and all that sort of thing. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. Well, sir, I do not understand them; but I thought the Senator did, because the Senator from Georgia spoke of it, and he seemed to understand it then. [Laughter.] I do not understand them; but I suppose it is parliamentary, highly so, [laughter,] or else it would not have been introduced. I do not know what the "right bower" is. I suppose it is a naval [knave-al] term, [laughter,] or something of that sort.

But I was proceeding. The Senator from Georgia and myself do not agree on political questions; we have differed; but, I believe, in our social intercourse we have never had any difficulty, and whenever it has been in my way—I do not know that I ever had an opportunity where it was in my power to do him a slight favor, but if it was the case—I would do it; but if he has the slightest personal regard for me, I beg to throw it into the same scale where the eloquence and pathos of the Senator from Pennsylvania have gone before me, and both together we ask for—a little onion seed. [Laughter.] Can he, under these circumstances, resist? No, sir.

I am as strict a constructionist of the Constitution as any, not excepting the honorable Senator before me, [Mr. Toombs;] but I have read all the platforms, and I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that he is a little too fast. I think, considering what has been done, we may continue to vote these seeds, at least until the Charleston convention sits; and then, I have no doubt, after these developments, there will be a new resolution that will cut off these seeds, and that onions will be unconstitutional ever after. [Laughter.] But until that is done, until that proviso is put in, I think the faithful may construe the provisions of the Constitution and the Cincinnati platform as the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania has suggested. I think we may construe them without straining the Constitution any more to buy onion seeds than it does to catch runaway slaves. I guess when you find a provision in the Constitution that there is a mode to take money out of the Federal Treasury to pay for returning fugitive slaves, you will find also the provision that a little sum may be paid for onion seed. Until a clause forbidding it comes either in the Constitution or the Charleston convention, let us have the seed; but I have no doubt that it will be unconstitutional after that convention sits.

Mr. PUGH. I am not going into this large collateral discussion, and I am sorry that my motion should have produced it. The Senator from Georgia has diverged into rivers and harbors; the Senator from Pennsylvania has given us an impassioned defense of his Democracy; my friend from Texas has indulged us in a general discourse, and the Senator from New Hampshire has done likewise. Now, sir, I simply propose to correct one or two mistakes of fact. This is not an established practice. At the first session of the last Congress the appropriation reported was $20,000. It was originally established upon a pretext of this character: that some of our ships of war visiting foreign countries occasionally brought home some rare seeds, such as we had none like in this country, and that a small appropriation would enable those seeds to be distributed to various agricultural societies; and the first appropriation was only $2,000, and it is a very few years old. As I said, at the first session of the last Congress the appropriation reported was $20,000; but on the motion of some member of the other House, not a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, it was increased to $60,000. When it came to this body it was increased to $75,000, on the allegation that $15,000 more was necessary for buying and distributing sugar-cane. I opposed it then. The answer was that we had a full Treasury, that we had more money than the Government needed, and that it was wiser to distribute it among the people in this way. Now we have come to a time when we need retrenchment. The Senator from Pennsylvania talks about the sixty or seventy millions of our expenses. Where shall we retrench? I have looked in vain for him, as the special representative of this Administration, to tell me, as one of the members of Congress, where I shall put the knife of retrenchment. I listened on the Indian appropriation bill, but the Senator could not tell me a place where I could retrench a cent there. I listened on the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill—no retrenchment there; and yet, sir, we have borrowed $20,000,000 on Treasury notes, and have passed a bill to borrow $15,000,000 on coupon bonds; and so we go on, and as often as we come from one proposition to another, and ask, "cannot this be dispensed with, at least until we are able to pay our debts?" we are told, this is a very little thing, let it pass.

Now, sir, it is not a little thing. It is an unnecessary thing. I do not say whether it is constitutional or unconstitutional; I need not go into that argument. It is unnecessary. If you dispense with it, you not merely dispense with the expenditure of $60,000 here named, but a vast amount besides; you dispense with the services of three or four employes in the Patent Office; you get rid of them; you get rid of the freight and transportation and commissions of agents; you get rid of the enormous expenditures of the transportation of the mails. I had occasion to read the debates of the Federal convention the other day, and I discovered that the Post Office Department was given to the Federal Government as a source of revenue. It was put on that foundation that we could derive a revenue from postages; and now we go on an annual loss of almost a million dollars in that Department. Instead of being a source of revenue, it is a source of loss.

Mr. COLLAMER. Six million dollars is the deficiency this year.

Mr. PUGH. Worse yet. The Senator from Texas says it does not increase the cost of transporting the mail because the contractor has to carry all you give him. Of course, but he makes his bid knowing what he is to receive. I suppose every member of Congress receives as I do bags and boxes of these seeds, and the gentleman who keeps our stationery office furnishes me with parchment envelopes, and envelopes lined with cloth, bought at public expense, to put the seeds into. We have agents and servants about the Senate, who come and take them from my house to the Post Office Department, and they go into the mails. They load down the mails, and who is benefited? My friend from Missouri talks about the farmer being benefited or the man who gets them. That is all absurd. You take five dollars out of his pocket in the shape of tax, and give him back a paper of seeds worth twenty-five cents.

Mr. GREEN. Let me correct the Senator. I said he was injured.

Mr. PUGH. Injured by the bad seed?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. PUGH. But I put it on this ground, that it is an unnecessary expenditure of public money. It is like the system of distributing books. Books are useful; it is a very good thing to have nice books to give our constituents. It would be a very good thing if we had bread and meat to give to our constituents, free of cost. It would be a very good thing if we could give the best tools to the mechanics; but there is no necessity for it. They can buy them cheaper than we can. It is an appropriation of a sum of money which might be used much more usefully; and it involves other and greater expenditures behind. It is not with any view of going into these questions of Democracy—the union-Democracy on one side, and anti-union-Democracy on the other. I put it on the simple ground that you are borrowing money to pay the expenses of the Government, and that it is your duty to retrench everywhere in large expenditures and in small ones; and when you have retrenched as far as possible, then you can go home to your constituents and say, we have endeavored to bring the expenses of the Government within its revenue. I do not go into the constitutional question at all. I think that, at least until we are able to have an overflowing Treasury, we can dispense with this expenditure of public money; and when we come to the naval appropriation bill, and the Army appropriation bill, I hope some one better acquainted with those subjects than I am, will show me where I can strike down millions, as I here propose to strike down thousands.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio to propose to reduce the amount one half, this year. I think that will be enough.

Mr. PUGH. I think it might all be dispensed with. If this motion fails, I shall move to reduce the appropriation to $20,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will vote to reduce it half, but I do not want to take it all out.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bright, Broderick, Clay, Davis, Dixon, Finch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Seward, Shields, Stidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Tremain, Trumbull, and Wilson—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Fessenden, Foster, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Jones, Kennedy, King, Pearce, Rice, Sebastian, Simmons, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Wade, Wright, and Yulee—24.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. I now move to strike out "$60,000," and insert "$20,000." That was the amount reported at the first session of the last Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert after line one hundred and eighty-five:

To enable the Commissioner of Public Buildings to sit up with slaves the two rooms at the south end of the Library of Congress, for the use of the library, and putting up a partition in the passage to them, $270.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line two hundred and two:

For repairs of Pennsylvania avenue, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line two hundred and fifteen:

For continuation of the filling up of ravine and grading Judiciary square, $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the last amendment:

For continuing the grading and planting with trees the improved portions of the mall, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out of the clause appropriating $830,000 for the completion of the Washington aqueduct, the following proviso:

"Provided, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended until contracts shall be entered into with responsible parties for the completion of the work, which, in the aggregate, shall not exceed the amount hereby appropriated."

Mr. PUGH. I should like to ask the chairman of the Finance Committee why he thinks the proviso should be stricken out?

Mr. HUNTER. It is proposed to be stricken out because we understand contracts have already been made, and the work will be completed within the limit. The effect of adopting this amendment, if I am correctly informed, will be to reopen the whole thing; and the officers will have to advertise again for new contracts. The contracts, I understand, have now been accepted; and I learn from the superintendent that the work will be concluded within the amount named.

Mr. PEARCE. Bids have been accepted for every material to be supplied for the completion of the work, except the cement. I am sure that is the only exception. There is another reason for not agreeing to this proviso. There are certain parts of the work which will not be done by contract. The contracts are for stone, cement, and various materials to be delivered here in Washington. Contractors do not contract to deliver them on the line of the aqueduct where they are wanted. The superintendent has been provided with boats for conveying these materials to different points on the line of the aqueduct where they are wanted, and he will not be able to carry out that plan if you insist upon having everything done by contract. You would have to throw away the boats, or sell them at a great sacrifice. It seems to me to be unnecessary. All the contracts have been awarded, with the single exception of the one for cement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert, after line two hundred and forty-four:

For United States Capitol extension, $750,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be expended, in whole or in part, upon the embellishment or decoration of the Capitol extension, either by painting or sculpture in the panels or niches of the Senate or House, unless the designs for such embellishment and decoration shall have been first submitted to, and approved by, the Joint Committee of the Library of Congress.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment, to strike out all after the word "for," and insert:

"The completion of the Capitol extension, $1,185,183 34; and to enable the Library Committee to contract with distinguished artists for historical paintings and sculpture for the panels and niches of the Legislative Halls and of the great stairways of the Capitol extension, $50,000 in addition to funds already in their hands for that purpose."

Mr. HUNTER. The original estimate was $1,000,000 for this year. The House of Representatives did not insert the amount of the estimate in the appropriation bill, nor indeed any amount. The Committee on Finance agreed, after some consideration, to ask for $750,000, a part of the sum, towards the completion of the Capitol. In view of the present state of finances, it was thought there ought to be some reduction, especially as the House did not put it in. I should have been content, myself, with adopting the amount of $500,000; something I was disposed to insist on. I think we ought to have our end of the wing completed; at least the room into which we are to go. We have a right to insist on that much; and I was disposed to go for half the estimate. I am willing to go for $750,000; but I think we had better not ask for the whole under the circumstances. In regard to the latter part of the Senator's amendment, as to contracts with artists, I think I would rather postpone that, and have that hereafter, if we are to have it. I go, however, for completing the building. I go for what is necessary, in order to consummate what we have undertaken; and I think $750,000 is enough for the present.

Mr. POLK. I should like to know from the chairman of the Finance Committee how much it would require to finish the new Hall for the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. I am unable to say how much it would require to finish the new Hall. I believe the estimate to complete the whole is the amount named in the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. POLK. Then what is the standard by which the committee report $750,000?

Mr. HUNTER. It was supposed to be a compromise between a half and the whole. It was a general estimate.

Mr. DAVIS. The sum named in the amendment which I have asked for to complete the Capitol extension, is exactly the estimate. It is what remains unappropriated of the estimate for the completion of the Capitol; and with this I expect the wings to be completed. The sum asked for by the Committee on Finance is not enough to continue the work for the period of a year. The expenditure, when the work is carried on at full time with a full set of hands, is about one hundred thousand dollars a month. If $750,000 be appropriated, the appropriation will run out before the end of the year, the hands must be discharged, and application be made here for additional appropriations to complete the building; and when the additional appropriations are made the hands must be collected again at additional expense. A million dollars is the estimate of the superintendent for the year's expenditures. I have proposed, as an amendment, the sum estimated for the completion of the work, which is to add $185,183 to the amount needed for the year. If we accept his estimate and grant the whole amount, the work will be conducted more economically, and we have a right to require of him that it shall complete the building. If the Committee on Finance, compromising between his estimate and some fanciful sum, adopt an amount which they choose to give, he is not bound to perform any particular amount of work with that appropriation; he is not able to do it as economically as if he were to keep up the full organization of the work. Until he reaches the point of the construction of the portico, a large number of hands is the most economical mode of carrying on the work. At that point the hands must be reduced and the monthly expenditure must be reduced. A million dollars is estimated by him to answer all purposes for the year; but in order that I may insert the words "to complete" and make this a final appropriation, I choose to add the balance of the money which I find in his estimate for the completion of the work.

Then the addition which is made in regard to statues for the niches, and paintings for the panels, was put there because I found in the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance a proviso that none of this species of work should be done except in a particular way. Now the fact is, that no portion of the money granted for construction is, in my opinion, applicable to the work of making statues for the niches, or decorative paintings. The vacant panels that have been left on the wall indicate and suggest that they are, some day or other, to be filled with paintings. The money appropriated for the construction of the building has not been so applied, and I do not think it could be properly so applied. It must be by a vote of Congress that these paintings are to be made. It must be by a vote of Congress that statues are to be put in the niches. None of this money, if the whole sum asked for be granted, can be appropriated to either of these purposes. I have no wish to go on now with the paintings, or putting statues in the niches. I agree with the chairman of the Committee on Finance that it is better to postpone that; but I see no purpose in the proviso which is added to his amendment, unless it is to suggest to the minds of members, as it does to mine, that they are already proposing now to have the niches filled with statues and the panels on the walls filled with paintings.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to ask the Senator whether he cannot divide his amendment. I am in favor of appropriating $1,000,000 for finishing the Capitol, instead of $750,000 for the year. I want to vote first on that proposition irrespective of these questions about ornamenting the panels, because I am with the Senator as to the appropriation, but against him on the other point.

Mr. DAVIS. I should prefer to divide my amendment, and the reason I did not do so—I stuck the two provisions together with a wafer, as will be seen—was to get rid of a question of order, for which I have always great abhorrence.

Mr. SEWARD. So have I.

Mr. DAVIS. I prefer to have the question on the appropriation for the completion of the building. If I am understood, I will say nothing more.

Mr. PEARCE. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will so change his amendment as to leave out the second clause. There is certainly no necessity at present for appropriating money for paintings for the panels, and statues for the niches. Indeed that is a work of time. We might have these panels and niches filled with very unworthy objects of art, instead of such as should fill them; and I think it would be very well to arrange a system for the ornamentation of the Capitol by such objects, at a time when there is more money in the Treasury than there is now, and when we shall have leisure to digest such a system. I should prefer myself that the Library Committee were not charged with any such duty.

Mr. DAVIS. I have answered the principal object I had in bringing to the notice of the Senate the question of the decorative ornament of the Capitol. It is put, by the proposition, under the charge of the Committee on the Library; and the main object I had was to correct an error which is creeping into the popular mind, and has been disseminated over the Halls of Congress, that the Capitol has been decorated with the money given for construction. The painting of the walls, the coloring of the walls, the use of paint instead of ornamental paper on the walls, is not in the nature of historical paintings which are to fill the panels that are left vacant in all the walls. So, too, it has gone out that an immense amount is spent for statuary. Not a dollar has been spent for statuary except for the pediment, and that properly so spent, because the pediment of the building in which we now sit is ornamented, not equally, but in the same style. It was called for in the pediments of the extension because it was so in the original building. If I have now directed the attention of the Senate to the fact that no part of the appropriation heretofore made, and none of that about to be made can properly be employed for this purpose, I have answered my object.

Mr. HUNTER. I am opposed to increasing the appropriation, but I will state in regard to the proviso that I am very willing, personally, that it should be stricken out. The opinion of the Finance Committee was that the effect of adopting it would be to suspend any work of that kind until a future period—not that it was a means of providing for carrying it on, but stopping it so as to devote the money to the completion of the building.

Mr. DAVIS. I would ask the chairman, was it the opinion of the Committee on Finance that that work had ever been commenced?

Mr. HUNTER. Whether it is their opinion or not, it is an opinion that prevails; and for the purpose of putting an end to it, and satisfying any who had doubts in that regard, it was proposed to insert this proviso; but I am very willing that the proviso should be stricken out. I am not willing, however, to increase the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state for the information of the Senator from Mississippi that this proviso was put in, I believe, at my suggestion, although somewhat modified from the original form proposed by me, for this reason: I noticed that such a provision was inserted in the House of Representatives in order to make the appropriation more palatable. It was put in substantially, and then the House negatived the appropriation. My impression was that the appropriation might fare better in the House of Representatives if we had the proviso in so as to have a definite understanding on that point. It was proposed simply with reference to making the appropriation more acceptable in the other House, where it had been refused.

Mr. DAVIS. The objection to it is, that in attempting to make the appropriation palatable to the House of Representatives, it does injustice to the officer who has been charged with the superintendence of the work. It is a suggestion that money has been so applied when, in fact, it has not been.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to ask the Senator a question. Certain it is there has been a great deal of ornamental painting in the new portion of the Capitol. Has not that painting been paid for out of the general appropriation for erection? There is a great deal of fresco painting.

Mr. DAVIS. The coloring of the walls and the little figures introduced on them?

Mr. COLLAMER. Wherever there is a covering of a room, take for instance the Agricultural Committee-room of the House of Representatives, there are paintings on the panels of the walls and overhead, and so it is all over the new Capitol. I call that ornamental painting. Has not that been paid for out of the general appropriation?

Mr. DAVIS. There is fresco painting in the committee room to which the Senator refers, and I am glad that he has reminded me of it, because that room was prepared as a specimen to be submitted to Congress, and they were called upon by the then Secretary of War, being myself, to see whether or not they would have the other rooms completed in the same style, and they were told that if so, and if they would have the building floored with encaustic tiling, an additional sum of money would be required. An opinion was sought from Congress. It was not given by any vote, but it came to me in every other form that they wanted the building finished in the very highest order of modern art. One expression I recollect distinctly, because it was very striking, that Brother Jonathan was entitled to as good a house as any prince or potentate on earth, and generally that they wanted the best materials and best style of workmanship and highest order of art introduced into the Capitol of the United States. It was under that view that estimates were made for the appropriation passed.

Mr. COLLAMER. Still I understand that what we call painting has been done to a large extent. There may be historical paintings to be placed in the panels hereafter; that is another affair; but it is certain that painting to a large amount, to a great extent, in the new Capitol, has been done out of the money appropriated to the general erection. I do not say that I am opposed to this at all, though I may differ very much from some in relation to the taste with which it has been done; but I understand this proviso to be nothing but a restriction in relation to getting historical paintings, or something of that kind.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course I did not suppose the Finance Committee meant that they should not put paint on the walls. It was historical paintings, of course.

Mr. COLLAMER. I would very much desire, if it were possible, to put a restriction on this matter in relation to the ordinary paintings. I think the architectural character of the Representative Hall, as now finished, is entirely overburdened and disguised and thrown out of sight by the great variety of colors put in. I think it is a sort of Joseph's coat; and I desire very much that that kind of thing may be kept out of the new Senate Chamber; and I believe that a large portion of the Senators entertain the same taste and feelings. If anything can be done by way of securing a little more of chastity in it, I should desire it.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator would not reach his purpose at all by this proviso. It does not direct itself to that point at all. I would ask the Senator if he has been in the new Senate Chamber?

Mr. COLLAMER. I have been in it; but it is in so unfinished a state that I cannot judge of it.

Mr. DAVIS. You can judge of the ceiling.

Mr. COLLAMER. The only consolation I have about it is, that a little paint brush will take out all this coloring almost any time.

Mr. DAVIS. That is not answering my question.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have been in it, but it is in an unfinished condition.

Mr. DAVIS. The ceiling unfinished! I thought the ceiling was painted.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am talking now about the gilding, and half a dozen colors put into a cornice.

Mr. DAVIS. I think all is there that will be, unless you propose to add something more.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know what they propose to put there. I believe they have not got quite so much meretricious ornament, as I consider it, as in the Hall of the House of Representatives. Whether they mean to come up to that hereafter, I do not know.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator does not answer my question.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have answered the question. I have been in there and looked at it, but I regard it as an unfinished affair.

Mr. DAVIS. Then it is too plain for the Senator, I suppose. He may add more to it if he chooses. It is a more somber style than that of the Hall of the House of Representatives. In relation to the decision which the Senator makes on the amount of ornamentation which is exemplified in either, I will only say that my taste is too uncultivated to decide that question. Not having had the advantage of seeing the best specimens of art; not having studied painting as an art, I should be compelled to draw my judgment from the opinion of those who had made it the study of their lives. A man of very high reputation in that particular branch of art was charged with it; his work was examined from time to time, and corrected by an officer in whose taste I have great confidence; and I rather think that as the eye of those who are so ready to criticize is cultivated up to the highest style of art which is introduced into both the Senate and House Chambers, they will appreciate better and more approve what has been done. Some members of the House have had the frankness to tell me that they disliked the ceiling very much when they went into their new Hall, but have since become accustomed to it, and like it very well.

But all that amounts to very little. What is the painting or gilding worth when measured with the great purposes had in view? It was not to paint or to gild successfully that Congress appropriated money. It was to get a room in which they could hear; in which they could speak; in which the business could be conducted without the disorder that belonged to the old Hall. It was to give to the Senate a room of sufficient capacity for their purposes. The acoustic and the optic problems were considered of such importance as to make all the rest subordinate. The success in both respects, I think, has been eminent beyond any other public room of the same size of which I have heard in any part of the world. And if it has answered these great requisites, and if to these has been added a mode of heating which will give it an equal temperature, and a mode of ventilating which will prevent fumes and dust from rising from the floor and passing into the lungs of members, then I think we shall have achieved all that Congress had in view, or at least all that was considered of importance. Rub off the gilding, and paint out the colors; make them all one, if the Senator from Vermont desires not to have many colors; if the Senator wants to have all of one color, make it one. But there is not an artist who would attempt to ornament a building by painting with one color. His skill is shown in the harmony of the colors, blending them so that no one rests on the eye and commands its single attention. I would be surprised at the American Congress if it were to wipe out these great efforts of art, and introduce as a substitute the crude notion of a single color.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. STUART in the chair.) The Chair understands the Senator from Mississippi as withdrawing the latter branch of his amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. I shall offer that afterwards.

Mr. SEWARD. If we discuss from now until the end of the session, I do not think we shall be able to agree in regard to the decoration of the Chambers of the two Houses. It is a matter of taste, and our tastes differ naturally, and differ by cultivation and habit; but since there has been so much discussion on this subject, I barely wish to express my opinion on the question which has been raised between the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Mississippi. It seems to have been settled that it is necessary to have a Senate Chamber and a Representative Chamber in which everybody can hear everybody, and everybody can see everybody; and the want of these qualities rendered the old Chambers inconvenient. It seems also to have been settled that the only form in which a Chamber can be made, and furnish these two qualities, is the oblong and the parallelogram; and that there must be no breaking of the walls, no breaking of surfaces; there must be parallel and smooth surfaces. It is nothing else, then, in either case, but the form of a chest—the most graceless form in geometry or in architecture. When you have got that form, it certainly requires some modification, in some way, to make it agreeable to the eye and to make it pleasant to the taste. I have considered the matter, and I do not know any way in which the Hall of the House of Representatives could have been relieved of the serious objection of the deformity so disagreeable to the eye, of an oblong room with naked, smooth surfaces, and commended it to my taste so effectually as it has been by the process of embellishment which has been adopted. But, as has been said by others, so it is with me; I have not been trained to the study of this matter. I know that I do not appreciate the highest perfection of music as those do whose tastes have been cultivated up to it; and it is only as I study the art of painting that I come to appreciate qualities which those who are not versed in that art do not appreciate. I have thought it due to express my approbation of what has been done in both Chambers, and to say that, so far as I am concerned, I am content with it; but I do not suppose my opinion will be of any essential value.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I am not acquainted with the details of extending the wings of the Capitol; but there is one circumstance to which my attention has been drawn, and on which I should like to obtain information; and that is, who are the sculptors that are employed in the shanties out here, in preparing the different statues for their appropriate places in the new Capitol? I have observed some of them; and the goddess of Liberty, I believe, is one. I am an admirer of statuary, but I cannot say that I am a critic, or even an amateur, in that department of art. It does seem to me that it is a figure which makes rather a queer display in the Capitol. In the first place, I object to its attitude. It appears to me to be in anguish—drawn back in the most ungraceful and ungainly attitude for a lady. [Laughter.] It appears to be in torment; and had it been physical, I should have imagined that it really had a toil under the arm. [Laughter.] Take it all in all—take the total ensemble—I have seen nothing resembling it. Instead of the bare feet with sandals, it is represented with a very formidable pair of russet brogans, that would suit very well for laborers in the swamps of the South. That is one of the most queer and ridiculous things I have ever seen to represent human nature. I have never seen a wax figure but what was equally graceful and rather more beautiful and artistic in its appearance.

Then there is an Indian woman, or squaw, to be more technical, seated on a slab of marble. That may be very well executed; but she has a little papoose in her arms, and its little head is sticking out like a terrapin's, [laughter.] without reclining gracefully on the arm. She has a blanket, or something, holding it up; and its little neck, without the least curve or grace, is very stiff, like an apple on a stick. [Laughter.] Now, sir, think of it; that throughout all ages, as long as this Capitol shall stand, or this Union exist, which I hope is to be forever, that poor little Indian has to sustain a heavy head with that little neck, and without a mother's aid to hold it reclining on her arms. [Laughter.] Any person who will look at that must be agonized. Sir, the scenes around us in this building ought to inspire cheerfulness and pleasure. Instead of that, a contemplation of this figure will inflict agony on every human being of sensibility.

And then there is a poor Indian boy, who looks as if of Oriental stock. He has a large shell on his shoulders and, in this agonizing attitude, water is to spout continually on him. He is in the most servile, miserable, cruel, agonizing attitude in which I ever saw a creature. It will inspire us with feelings of anguish if we should ever see these figures displayed about this Capitol. I would like to have the gentlemen of the Senate go and see them, before they are placed in a situation where they will have to be removed; for it will cost something to place them there. I insist that, at least, there ought to be an amendment for the purpose of providing curtains to hang in front of them, so that they shall never be seen. I am a man of sympathy; I feel for human suffering; and I could not contemplate one of these three figures without the extremest agony. They are in torment; you would suppose they were representations of some criminal that had committed an unpardonable offense, for which he was doomed to perpetual agony. I object to their going into this Capitol, or being about it. I do not know the artist; I cannot exactly say whether he is a native—no, sir, I know he is not a native; for a native artist, observing nature as it is in our forests and in our wilds—for we all more or less pass through forests and see nature, animal, vegetable, material, all around us—could not have fancied such sketches as these are. I object to them unequivocally; I can never submit to them.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator's sympathetic heart is greatly moved at this mother of stone's rude treatment of her child; and his sympathy getting possession of his judgment, and his industry not having induced him to acquire any information on the subject, he supposes these statues are to go in the Capitol. One is a faun, a piece merely intended to be put under a fountain. He mixes up the group made for the pediment with the idea of statues for the niches in the Capitol; and after all that his eyes drank in had been exhausted, he turned his imagination loose, and commenced on the broad field of assumption; and he presumed it would be presumption in any man in this Chamber to attempt to strip from Crawford, the great American genius, whose name has shed a luster upon our country, his merit as an artist—one whose early death was the nation's loss, and whom the nation yet deploras. He it was who, so ignorant in the eyes of the Senator from Texas, modeled those masterpieces of art, which he did not live to see finally executed; and yet the Senator assumes that he must have been a foreigner; and he no doubt felt himself safe from the supposition, because in the United States we have so few sculptors that we might have been driven to employ a foreigner! There were two pediments. One was offered to Crawford, the man of highest genius who ever held an American chisel in his hand. He took it. That is the master work of his life, and will stand as long as the Senator hopes the Union will stand, as a monument of his genius, and an honor to his country. The other was offered to Powers. He declined it. His high reputation as an American artist caused me to regret that he declined it. It is still open to an American artist. It has been offered to none other; no invitation has been given to any other than American artists. If the Senator will inform himself a little more, his criticisms hereafter may be spared the corrections which they now provoke.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will ask whether Mr. Crawford lived to complete the pieces he designed, and what pieces he designed?

Mr. DAVIS. Every one that belongs to the pediment, accomplished by his own hand, and imported here, and seen in the progress of its execution; but a disease that proved fatal before its final accomplishment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe it is not completed yet. How any man, unless he was under the influence of a diseased brain, could ever have fancied that a pair of brogans were becoming, and incorporated necessarily with heathen mythology, [laughter.] I cannot conceive.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator must allow me to instruct him, because his wit is out of place, and particularly as it is practiced on a dead artist of such eminent character.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is on the marble.

Mr. DAVIS. It is no heathen mythology.

Mr. HOUSTON. The goddess of Liberty?

Mr. DAVIS. You did not even stop to learn the name of the thing, or the distance at which it was to be viewed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not want to do it.

[Laughter.] I was satisfied that it was some unfortunate lady that had fallen into great bodily agony and infelicity of feeling. Her countenance denotes no pleasure. I should like to know what lady has commended herself to the consideration of the Government, in a national point of view, so far as to be entitled to so much bestowment of art, and of labor, and expenditure, that has worn brogan shoes? [Laughter.] I commend it to the special notice of Senators. Her robe is floating; the zone is bound with loose drapery; and who ever heard of a person, thus dressed and decorated, wearing brogan shoes? Nobody, Mr. President, ever heard of it. It is not wit; it is matter of gravity and solemn complaint with me. Who ever heard of a mother holding a child in her arms, with the little fellow's neck sticking out like your finger? No, sir; it reclines on the mother's arm and is not drawn up in that agonizing attitude. It is unheard of. I do not care who has done it—it is an imposition upon art. Crawford was a genius, and he never did it. It is impossible that genius, taste, or fancy, could ever have suggested such a thing. Sir, go and look at the two statues. Look at the infant in the mother's arms, and see its attitude, and what it must perpetually endure. See, too, the attitude of that personage—I do not know who she is; it appears I was mistaken in supposing she was the goddess of Liberty. Certainly, I would have taken no undue liberties with her, [laughter.] because, to have commented on the model appears to be culpable. I did not intend it; I intended nothing but to deliver my opinion. I am not a scribbler, or I should have criticised them in the newspapers, to have prevented their introduction to the public eye. They will become their present condition; they are unfinished, and I hope will remain so as long as time lasts; for whenever the artist, or the lover of nature, or the admirer of beauty, of grace, and of elegance, comes to contemplate them, they must be condemned, no matter who produced them. I intend no reflection on the sculptor. I intend not the slightest reflection on the memory of the departed. My friends and my enemies are to me alike when covered by the earth's dust—bearing no part of my animosity. I only extend the sympathies of friendship to my friends with a tenderness that, perhaps, I have not had the generosity to bestow upon my adversaries; but I never reflected upon an artist or a man of genius. Being deficient in it myself, I admire it in others; and I am willing to accord to them the highest eulogiums—the highest praise; but I judge the tree by its fruit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STUART.) The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, as modified; which was, to strike out all after the word "for" in the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, and insert:

The completion of the Capitol extension, $1,185,183 34.

Mr. HUNTER. For one, I am not willing to appropriate the entire amount. I think that where ever we can, we ought to cut off something from the estimates for public buildings and prosecute them a little more slowly. We have had to propose to appropriate for other public buildings over the country, in order to perform existing contracts, and we shall make the appropriations so large that there will be no chance of meeting them with any means we have. It may be that they could expend the whole sum proposed to be appropriated, by the meeting of the next Congress; but I would rather they should go on more slowly. Let us save whenever we can, if it be only two or three hundred thousand dollars. It would be a great point if we could succeed in cutting down the estimates, if we can do so consistently with the public service, three or four millions. We shall find relief at the next session if we succeed in doing it.

Mr. DAVIS. If the object of the chairman of the Committee on Finance is economy, he is pursuing the wrong road. Unless he allows the superintendent to have that amount of money which will keep the whole force on the work, it follows as a necessary consequence that he will have to discharge the force, and reemploy them when he gets additional appropriations. The difference between the sum necessary to complete the work, and that which the committee agreed to allow, is $435,000. I think it much better to appropriate the whole sum, and require the superintendent to complete the building with it, than to come near that whole sum, and then have to give a subsequent appropriation, with a knowledge that you must increase his estimate if you destroy his organization.

Mr. HUNTER. We have had to meet that argument in other public buildings, and we shall have to meet it in any reduction proposed in navy-yards. It is essential that we should reduce where ever we can. In times like these we must go on slowly. If we had the money, I have no doubt it would be better to go on with many of the public works more rapidly than we propose to do in the appropriation bills; but looking to our condition, the committee felt it was due to the state of the Treasury that wherever we could, we should carry on these works more slowly. I believe $750,000 is appropriating more liberally, in proportion to the whole sum that is wanting, than we appropriate for various other works that are in progress.

Mr. IVERSON. I shall vote against this proposition to increase the appropriation; but I think I shall follow out the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and move to strike out $750,000 and insert $500,000. I have no doubt it will require the amount estimated by the Senator from Mississippi to complete the Capitol.

Mr. DAVIS. It requires that amount to complete it now; but if the superintendent does not get it now, he will require more hereafter.

Mr. IVERSON. I do not understand that reasoning. It does not satisfy me that because it requires $1,185,000 now, it will require more if you do not appropriate that money now. The Senator from Mississippi says the expenditures are about one hundred thousand dollars a month. Well, sir, you can very easily reduce that $100,000 a month, without any harm whatever to the building, by simply discharging a portion of the operatives. The expenditure is simply the amount you pay to your operatives, to your employes. If you pay $100,000 a month to them, by reducing them one half, you will only have to pay $50,000, and it will merely run the expenditure over a larger space of time—that is all.

Mr. DAVIS. I will tell the Senator why I think it will require more money if the whole appropriation be not now made. The officer must keep the same number of principal workmen, the same number of overseers, draughtsmen, and superintendents, that he would have with a larger body of operatives. The expensive part of the personnel must be kept up with the smaller organization. Consequently it will cost more money; because, when he disbands his men and brings them back again, he must expect to pay for bringing them back.

Mr. IVERSON. I apprehend that all the models and drawings have already been made. Certainly at this stage of the proceedings new models and new drawings are not to be exhibited. They must have all been agreed upon and furnished long since. There is no necessity, then, for employing artists for that purpose. All that has been done already, every room in the building, has been planned; the execution of the whole of it has been planned, and the whole of it entered upon; it is all understood, and does not require the employment of those artists, it seems to me, to carry it on.

I think it eminently proper, in the present condition of the public finances, that the appropriations should be limited; and we ought to commence here on the Capitol, which is intended for our convenience. That is the proper place to stop expenditures and lessen them. The Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives, instead of appropriating money to go on with the fortifications and necessary defenses of the country, have only proposed to appropriate a sufficient amount to keep them in repair, to keep them in a condition of not wasting or going to decay. Many fortifications of essential interest and benefit to the country are to be left in this condition. The one which is the key to the Gulf of Mexico, the one which is more important, perhaps, than all the others put together to the southern country, especially to those States lying on the Gulf of Mexico, is to be left in this condition. The fortifications on Tortugas are to be left in this condition, for the express reason that there is not enough money in the Treasury to go on with these works. So in my own State; $200,000 was appropriated at the last Congress to erect a naval depot on Blythe Island, near Brunswick, Georgia. The Secretary of the Navy, in response to a call made by a resolution of mine, states that the site has been purchased, but that no other proceedings will be carried on in relation to that work, because the Administration have determined not to commence any new work.

If we are not to apply money already appropriated in the commencement of a new work which is considered important to my section and to other sections, I think we ought not to expend so much money on the Capitol of the United States. Let us appropriate $500,000 this year. Let the superintendent dismiss a portion of his employes, and keep the rest in reserve for the next year. We shall meet here in December; an appropriation bill can be passed immediately, if this appropriation should be exhausted in the mean time; and we can then appropriate a sufficient amount to go on with the work to a conclusion. I think it is better, in the condition of the Treasury, that we should spread those expenditures over a great space of time as possible, so that the work be not delayed or injured by neglect. I am in favor of the least amount of expenditure, and I shall move to strike out the $750,000 reported by the Committee on Finance, and insert $500,000, which I think will be amply sufficient to keep the superintendent and all the necessary workmen engaged there the present year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADE called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Bright, Broderick, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Douglas, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Jones, Kennedy, Pearce, Rice, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wilson, and Yulee—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Chandler, Clingman, Collamer, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Harlan, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Slidell, Trumbull, Wade, and Wright—27.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I now offer the other branch as a proviso to the amendment of the committee. I propose to strike out the following proviso of the committee's amendment:

"Provided, That this appropriation shall not be expended, in whole or in part, upon the embellishment or decoration of the Capitol extension, either by painting or sculpture in the panels or niches of the Senate or House, unless the designs for such embellishment and decoration shall have been first submitted to, and approved by, the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress."

And insert in lieu thereof:

To enable the Library Committee to contract with distinguished artists for historical paintings and sculpture, for the panels and niches of the legislative Halls, and of the great stairways of the Capitol extension, $50,000, in addition to the funds already in their hands for that purpose.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask a division on striking out and inserting. I want to strike out the proviso, but not to insert the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from New York that the motion to strike out and insert is not divisible.

Mr. HUNTER. I would suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that perhaps he could accomplish his object in another way. If he dislikes the proviso, I have no objection to its being stricken out. I do not think it accomplishes much, one way or the other. It was merely supposed it might, perhaps, make the appropriation more acceptable to the House of Representatives. I am willing for that to be stricken out, but I am unwilling to vote $50,000 for artists. I think that ought to be postponed. If he chooses to move to strike out, he can move that, and then move to insert the additional appropriation, and he can thus in effect divide the proposition.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no anxiety about the appropriation. The Committee on the Library can go into the question at once. I doubt very much whether they would expend a dollar of the money for a year or two, if it was appropriated now.

Mr. PEARCE. I will say that I think the proviso entirely unnecessary. I am satisfied that the Library Committee really have no authority to expend any money for the purpose of statues and paintings in the niches and panels. The appropriation is designed for the continuation of the building of the structure; and although the proviso is that none of the appropriation shall be expended for the purposes I have just mentioned, except by the approbation of the Library Committee, the language would seem to imply that, with their approbation, it might be so expended. I am certain if it were left to the Library Committee, they would not now expend a dollar of it in that way. They want the building completed first. All this ornamentation is surplusage; it can be better done afterwards than now. I think it is as well to get rid of the proviso. I do not see any necessity for it.

Mr. DAVIS. Let the question be taken on striking out the proviso. I propose, first, to strike out the proviso of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COLLAMER. Do I understand the honorable Senator to move that as a division of his motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is stated in that form; but it is a separate proposition.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to inquire whether the Senator from Mississippi expects to strike out this proviso with a view to inserting anything?

Mr. DAVIS. I accepted the suggestion of the Senator from New York, to divide the question.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Chair decided that it could not be divided.

Mr. DAVIS. Let the question be divided, so as to strike out.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then you must modify your motion in that way.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Mississippi to modify his motion, so as to confine it to striking out the proviso of the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The motion to strike out was agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas twenty-five, nays not counted.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out the following clause:

"For the purchase of fifty copies of the Diplomatic Correspondence of the United States from 1776 to 1783, in six volumes, at five dollars per volume, to supply such States and Territories as have not been furnished with them, and such of our missions abroad as have not been heretofore furnished, the sum of $1,500."

Mr. HUNTER. The request of the Department was, that they should purchase five hundred copies. That would have amounted to a much larger sum. The House of Representatives, instead of five hundred, put in fifty. Mr. Rives, who has the stereotyped plates, says he would not furnish such a small number as that, he would lose by it, and to justify him in undertaking the task, it would be necessary to take more copies. The committee concluded that, for the present, it was best to strike out the whole proposition. There is no pressing necessity for it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the first section:

For defraying the expenses of a certain party of Omaha Indians who visited the city of Washington during the months of February and March, 1852, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior—being the balance of a former appropriation, which was carried to the surplus fund on the 30th June, 1857—$335.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert:

For payment to the Secretary of the Senate of the sums paid by him to the representatives of Senators Bell, Butler, and Rusk, under the resolution of the Senate of the 10th of March, 1853, directing the payment of the same, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to the representatives of the said Senators respectively, $2,589 04.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was:

For continuing the extension of the Treasury building, $500,000.

Mr. HUNTER. Before that question is taken I wish to give some explanation. There are here a whole series of amendments, which relate to the extension of the Treasury building and certain custom-houses and marine hospitals, which were inserted upon estimate by the Secretary of the Treasury. The whole amount is $1,700,000. These were estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury for the reason that most of the money was necessary to carry out existing contracts, made at a time when the Treasury was full, and in regard to some of these contracts, perhaps most of them, before he came into office. Large contracts were entered into for material. This material will be delivered and we shall have to pay for it, and he has only asked for so much in addition as will be necessary to put it up as it is delivered. He does not ask a cent to go beyond this—to go beyond what is necessary to carry out existing contracts, and to use up the material which will be thus furnished. Under the circumstances it seemed to the committee to be economy, indeed it seemed to be necessary, because if we do not meet these contracts the contractors will come upon us for damages. Most of the money will be required for that purpose. There will be some of it in addition, as I said before, for the purpose of bringing it here. If you bring a block of carved marble and expose it to the weather it would lose almost its value unless put in a safe place.

The appropriation asked for being confined to these objects, the Committee on Finance thought it was due to public credit as well as to economy to propose an appropriation for them. Nothing has been asked by the Secretary for any new building. Nothing has been asked for by him for any building where he could, without a violation of the public faith, postpone the work. That being the case, we did not see what we could do but to propose to satisfy these contracts and to make these appropriations.

In regard to the Treasury building, I will say that the contracts were made for the delivery of materials very far ahead of the predecessor of the present Secretary of the Treasury, at a time when the Treasury was full, when it was a judicious mode of expending money, and this stone is now being delivered when we are not very full of funds. The scheme is to employ hands enough to use it as it comes, and not to stop that work, because the delivery of the material is a very expensive thing. Under these circumstances, it seems to be economy to appropriate what the Secretary has asked.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if these contracts of the Secretary, made for these great quantities, were according to law. I understand the law of May 1, 1820, is that contracts shall not be made unless there is an appropriation adequate to carry them out. Had he the right to make contracts ahead of the appropriations?

Mr. HUNTER. I am not able to say how that is. I have not investigated that question. Contracts have been made. I do not know how far they were justified by law, how far the special law making appropriation for these custom-houses may have justified them. I cannot answer that question. I do not know; but certain it is the contracts have been made, and the material is being delivered in large quantities. We have to pay for it as it is delivered, under the contracts; and it is economy, in regard to these buildings, to employ just so much labor as will be necessary to use up the materials, instead of leaving it exposed to the weather.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to move an amendment to the amendment:

And for the construction of a building for a post office and other Government purposes in the city of Brooklyn, State of New York, $50,000; and also such additional sum as may be necessary to purchase a suitable site for such building, not to exceed $30,000.

Mr. HUNTER. Does the Senator move that as an amendment to this for the completion of the Treasury building?

Mr. SEWARD. An amendment to your amendment. I suppose your amendment is to complete the whole of the buildings now in process of construction.

Mr. HUNTER. I should be very glad if the sense of the Senate were taken on it as a whole—the whole estimate for $1,700,000—but I suppose it will be taken on these separate items first. I will say in regard to the Senator's proposition, however, that I shall have to ask if there is any estimate for it from the Department, any recommendation from a committee, in order to make it in order?

Mr. SEWARD. I am not able to say that I have.

Mr. HUNTER. Then it is not in order.

Mr. SEWARD. It is very important that there should be these buildings in the city of Brooklyn, and this is a very reasonable place to put the provision, and the amount is a very reasonable estimate.

Mr. HUNTER. Then it is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the amendment is excluded by the rule of the Senate.

Mr. POLK. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance one question. I see that the amount of $20,000 is mentioned to be appropriated to the completion of the custom-house or public building, not only for a custom-house, but other purposes, in the city of St. Louis. I should like to learn from the chairman if he is satisfied that $20,000 will effect that purpose. I was under the impression that it would require, perhaps, $30,000.

Mr. HUNTER. I will look to the report.

Mr. POLK. While the Senator is looking for the paper, I will observe that this is the state of the case in reference to that building: some thirty thousand dollars will complete it; and when completed, it will accommodate all the United States offices in the city of St. Louis. As the matter now is, there is probably expended every year by the United States for rent, a sum equal to the amount that will be necessary to complete this building.

Mr. HUNTER. I have found the paper. The estimate is $20,000, to complete the custom-house at St. Louis, estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Bowman, who is in charge of the work.

Mr. GREEN. I had an interview with Mr. Bowman myself, and he showed me his exhibit, stating it at $29,600.

Mr. HUNTER. Here is the document.

Mr. GREEN. I cannot help his document.

Mr. HUNTER. We have not come to that, though. When we do come to it, I shall have the document read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia desire a division of the amendment? It is all one amendment, the Chair thinks.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I do not desire a division. I am willing for Senators to question me in regard to any one item. I think it had better be taken as a whole. The estimate is as a whole, and I ask that this paper be read, by way of explanation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask whether the Senator from Missouri has looked far enough ahead. I see there is one appropriation for $20,000, to complete the St. Louis custom-house, and another appropriation afterwards under the head of fencing, grading, paving, and furnishing custom-houses, and it says at St. Louis, Missouri, $14,600, making altogether $34,600.

Mr. GREEN. He told me that $29,600 would finish the grading and fencing, and make it all perfect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then you have more than you want.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The whole amendment will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

For continuing the extension of the Treasury building, $500,000.

For continuing the work on the custom-house at New Orleans, Louisiana, $350,000.

For continuing the work on the custom-house at Charleston, South Carolina, $300,000.

For the completion of custom-houses at the following places, namely: at Ellsworth, Maine, $2,000; at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $50,000; at Bristol, Rhode Island, including fencing and grading, $5,000; at New Haven, Connecticut, $60,000; at Oswego, New York, $10,000; at Plattsburg, New York, $10,000; at Newark, New Jersey, $10,000; at Norfolk, Virginia, $20,000; at Pensacola, Florida, $5,000; at St. Louis, Missouri, $20,000; at Mobile, Alabama, including fencing and paving, $30,000; at Galena, Illinois, $10,000; at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, $10,000; and for annual repairs at custom houses, $15,000.

For the completion of marine hospitals at the following places, namely: at Portland, Maine, $3,000; at St. Mark's, Florida, $2,500; at New Orleans, Louisiana, including filling up site, grading, introducing gas and water pipes, and fixtures, and fencing, $85,000; at Cincinnati, Ohio, $50,000; at Galena, Illinois, $5,000; and for annual repairs at marine hospitals, $15,000.

For fencing, grading, paving, and furnishing the custom-houses at the following places, namely: at Ellsworth, Maine, $3,000; at Bath, Maine, (for furniture alone), $1,100; at Burlington, Vermont, $4,600; at New Haven, Connecticut, $8,500; at Oswego, New York, $7,300; at Plattsburg, New York, $9,900; at Newark, New Jersey, $5,200; at Alexandria, Virginia, $3,700; at Norfolk, Virginia, $12,000; at Mobile, Alabama, (for furniture alone), $2,600; at Pensacola, Florida, $2,500; at St. Louis, Missouri, $14,600; at Louisville, Kentucky, $3,900; at Cleveland, Ohio, $7,100; at Galena, Illinois, $3,700; at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, $7,700.

For fencing, grading, paving, and furnishing the marine hospitals at the following places, namely: at Burlington, Vermont, $3,400; at Chelsea, Massachusetts, (out-buildings, grading, and fencing,) $19,700; at St. Mark's, Florida, $1,200; at Detroit, Michigan, $7,500; at Galena, Illinois, $3,900; at Burlington, Iowa, $4,100.

Mr. HUNTER. I now send to the desk the document to which I have alluded, and I ask that it be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 10, 1858.

SIR: I herewith transmit a communication from the construction bureau of this Department, asking for certain appropriations, to be expended in the prosecution of certain public buildings. The principal sums were estimated for in the report of that officer, which accompanied my annual report to Congress. The reasons for an increased estimate in some instances are set forth in the accompanying communication.

This branch of the public service has been conducted with a proper regard to the existing state of the Treasury. When the works are progressing under contracts, there is no discretion with the Department to limit their progress; but in other cases the expenditure is limited to such amounts as will prevent injury to the works in progress from a total suspension of them.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
HOWELL COBB,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JAMES L. ORR,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 6, 1858.

SIR: In my annual report to you on the condition of the several buildings being erected under the Treasury Department, I had the honor to call attention to the appropriations required to be made to carry on the works with economy, having a proper regard to the pecuniary embarrassment of the Treasury.

Since that period (September 30) the works have progressed with increased vigor, owing to the abundance and comparative cheapness of materials and labor, consequent upon the hard times. The result has been that larger expenditures have been made than could then be anticipated. As most of the works are being done by contract, it was impossible to restrain the increased expenditures.

From this cause the unexpended balances that were expected to be available for the first two quarters of the next fiscal year are greatly reduced, and in some instances entirely expended. Owing to this increased vigor in prosecuting the works, many of them will be finished, if the necessary appropriations are now made, before the next meeting of Congress.

In view of these circumstances, and to avoid damages which the contractors will not fail to demand if the works are suspended, and at the same time to save the large amounts now annually paid for rent of buildings, which those in question are designed to replace, I would most respectfully recommend that Congress be requested to make the following appropriations: All designed to complete, in every particular, all the buildings named, except the custom-houses at New Orleans and Charleston, and the Treasury extension, of which latter the sum asked will finish the south and a portion of the west wing.

I also subjoin estimates in gross, accompanied by others in detail, of the amounts necessary to fence, grade, and furnish those buildings that are now completed or that will be finished before the next meeting of Congress.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. H. BOWMAN,
Engineer in charge Treasury Department.

Hon. HOWELL COBB, Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PUGH. I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia a question. What is the gross amount covered by these various estimates in this amendment?

Mr. HUNTER. One million seven hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. PUGH. I want to direct his attention and that of the Senate to the fact that three appropriations amount to $1,150,000. Three of them are more than two thirds of the whole—the Treasury extension, the custom-house at New Orleans, and the custom-house at Charleston, South Carolina.

Mr. HUNTER. The explanation in regard to the Treasury building I have given. In regard to the custom-houses at New Orleans and Charleston, as I have said before, the materials are delivered there. There were large contracts for materials, which have been delivered. This estimate is only for so much labor as may be necessary to put up the material which is to be delivered under contracts. These contracts we must meet and pay for.

Mr. PUGH. I do not object to them, but when I hear so much about geographical inequality of appropriations, I direct the attention of the Senate to that fact.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me—I do not know that it will do any good to mention it—that the Senate ought not to pass this lightly over. Here is an appropriation of $500,000 for the extension of the Treasury building, which the chairman of the Committee on Finance tells us is simply to carry out contracts already made, by which the material is to be delivered; and this is for the labor necessary to use it. I understand that such a contract as that is illegal, and that neither the Secretary of the Treasury nor anybody else had any authority to make it; that the law of 1820 expressly forbids everybody, except the Commissary General, and the Navy Department in certain instances, from making a contract, unless there is a law especially for it, or an appropriation adequate to it; and if he has gone on and made these contracts, without law and without an adequate appropriation, I think the Senate ought to look into it, and ought not to vote to pay illegal contracts thus made by the Secretary.

Mr. HUNTER. They have not paid a cent, as I understand. During the next fiscal year, under contracts already made—made by the predecessor of the present Secretary—this material will be delivered. When it is delivered under the contract, it ought to be paid for; and when it is paid for, then the only additional estimate is for labor enough to use that material.

Mr. HALE. It is the very thing I am complaining of, that the Secretary has made these contracts, and made them in the very face of the law which says he shall not make them unless there is a law authorizing him to make contracts. I do not understand that there was in this case, and it is manifest there is no appropriation adequate to carry them out; for if there was, we should not be asked to appropriate the money now. I am not willing to register a decree of a million and a half of money to carry out a contract which the Secretary is forbidden to make.

Mr. KING. I desire to offer an amendment as an additional clause:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is required to execute the provisions of the acts of Congress approved August 16, 1856, and March 3, 1857, authorizing and directing the said Secretary to cause to be constructed buildings therein mentioned for custom-house and post office purposes, and for the accommodation of the courts of the United States, and the appropriations made by the said acts are continued for the purpose of the execution of said provisions of said laws.

Mr. HUNTER. I believe in equity that amendment is not in order, but technically I suppose it is, as the Senator has introduced it for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of an existing law; that is, to force the Secretary to proceed at once to the erection of a building which he desires to postpone. I suppose it is in order, but it certainly ought not to be adopted.

Mr. KING. We have in this amendment of the Committee on Finance, appropriations to meet contracts and expenditures by the Secretary of the Treasury which it is alleged, and not contradicted by the chairman of the Committee on Finance—I have not examined the laws in relation to some of these appropriations myself—were not authorized by law. I ask that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to carry out the provision of laws already passed, which it is obligatory upon him to have executed; and I think it is with a very bad grace that his friends, or the friends of the Administration, come in here and ask that they shall be excused from executing laws which were passed when the funds were in the Treasury to meet the expenses, and that we shall appropriate for other purposes to meet contracts which were not authorized by law, and not authorized by appropriations; and thus, in fact, give to the executive department of the Government the entire control of the Treasury of the country. For what purpose is it that laws are passed and appropriations made? Surely that they may be executed and carried out by that Department of the Government who exercise that duty. If they are at liberty to execute a statute or not, to say "this law we will execute, and that we will not," and then ask us to make appropriations to carry out their purposes while they refuse to carry out appropriations Congress have ordered, there is no use of a Congress at all. What are we to expect in all the subordinate branches of the Government if here, at the capital of the nation, the chief executive officers utterly disregard the law, and assume, as it is assumed by the chairman of the committee here, that a discretion may exist with the Executive Departments to execute a law or not? I ask simply that the provisions of the laws of 1856 and 1857 shall be executed, and I think it a very reasonable request.

Mr. HUNTER. I will state the history of the amendment of the Finance Committee. It was offered in the House of Representatives, and that House refused to adopt it. It was with great reluctance that I could bring my mind to agree to it; but on the statement that it was necessary in order to carry out contracts—and whether they be legal or not it scarcely concerns us now to inquire, for they were not made by the present Secretary—contracts which already existed for the material, and for so much more labor as would be necessary to use this material. To that extent I was willing to go, but not one step further. If the Senate introduced any one of these new works where the completion can be postponed, and which the Secretary of the Treasury has postponed in consideration of the present condition of the Treasury, I, for one, will vote against this amendment which our committee have offered. In other words, I was only willing to vote for it upon the principle that I would go as far as was necessary in order to save the public faith, and when the material which we had thus contracted for was delivered, I would vote as much more as was necessary to put that in a safe condition.

So far as the committee's amendment is concerned, I simply seek to discharge a public duty; I would not turn on my heel to save it. If Senators believe the contracts were made against law—and that I neither affirm nor deny, for I have had no means of examining into it; if they believe the contracts were illegal let them vote them out; but that is no reason for voting in others where we can postpone the works and complete them at a more convenient season, or when we have more money in the Treasury. If they think the buildings which we propose to complete, and for which we propose to appropriate money, ought to be postponed, and the payment of those contracts postponed because they were illegal, let them vote them all out. I shall not say one word more in their favor than I have already said, for it was with great reluctance I went for them.

Mr. KING. I am in favor of economy in the expenditures of the Government, and I will go as far as any Senator in any action with a view to a legitimate reduction of the expenses of the Government. But there is a question here other than the appropriation of $50,000 or $100,000 to any particular purpose. We are called upon to vote appropriations of millions. At the commencement of this session we were asked to vote an appropriation of about nine million dollars of deficiency, which was concededly contracted on the part of the Government without appropriations by Congress. The Executive Departments go on and make expenditures, and then come to Congress and ask us to appropriate the money; and we are to be told the honor of the country is concerned in the payment of these debts because they have been contracted, and we must vote the money, when that same Executive Department refuses to use the money in the Treasury for the purposes for which Congress has appropriated it.

There are two sides to this question. The Executive Departments of the Government are not only spending millions of money unauthorized by any action of Congress, but they are refusing to expend money which they are authorized and required by an act of Congress to expend for certain purposes. What does this lead to but the giving to the executive department the authority to use the Treasury to its friends and partisans, and to purposes that promote its own interest and views where it pleases, with favor? It is an authority that never ought to exist with them. It does not exist with them by law, and for one, I will never, by my vote, ratify any such exercise of power by the Executive, and I am surprised that there should be an effort here to sustain the Government in this matter, by gentlemen who ask us, in the present condition of the Treasury, to refrain from voting large appropriations. Why, sir, in the very proposition to which I offer this amendment, there are heavy appropriations of $200,000, $300,000, and $500,000 to particular objects; $500,000 to the construction of the Treasury building here, a building which is not wanted for any special or immediate purpose; and small appropriations over the country at other places are to be withdrawn from them until they shall have lapsed to the Treasury, expired by the expiration of the force of the laws, and then perhaps never be done. In the one locality, about which I know something, a special and particular friend of the Administration has already obtained from the Department the pay for the site of the place, a site in my judgment not the very best that could have been found in the locality, but it was selected, and for that reason I am not disposed to talk about it. They had power to select a site and did so, and paid for it, and he has got the money which it was very convenient for him to have, I know; and which, so far as a neighbor is concerned, I have no objection to his having; but I have no idea that money which was appropriated, and which was in the Treasury at the time it was appropriated, shall be withheld, and that the public shall go without the accommodation Congress intended they should have on the mere arbitrary discretion of an executive officer. I wish this amendment appended to the amendment of the Finance Committee; and then if the chairman does not want any of it adopted, I have no very particular wish about it. Still I think it the duty of the executive department to execute the laws and not to undertake to assume a discretion to set them aside, and certainly not when they are using millions that they are not authorized to use and afterwards come to Congress to get them to ratify it.

Mr. GREEN. It does not seem to me to be very correct to characterize the Secretary of War or the heads of the Executive Departments as having made contracts without authority of law, when there is no evidence of it. True, there was a deficiency bill passed here; but I know, the Senate knows, and the country knows, that every one of the obligations provided for in it was incurred according to law, and the very law to which the Senator from New Hampshire refers, has a proviso in it excepting the cases in which the indebtedness occurred for which the deficiency bill passed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to inquire if it excepted the $250,000 for surveys in California?

Mr. GREEN. I understand all that. That is not the $5,000,000 to which the Senator from New York alluded.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was part of that bill.

Mr. GREEN. True, it was part of that bill; but the Senator from Illinois ought to know under what circumstances that indebtedness occurred. Continuing contracts were made, the work under which amounted to that sum, and it was required to meet an actual deficiency. Deficiency bills are incident to the nature of the Government; and while we all vote them with the greatest reluctance, and while we scrutinize them with the utmost care, as we ought to do, it is not very appropriate to charge an executive officer with a violation of law, when the law leaves a margin within which he may exercise his discretion; and he not only has the right, but it is his imperative duty to do so. There are cases in which, if the appropriation were to be exhausted, the Army would have to be disbanded; the Navy would have to be dismantled; the ships left to rot, and the arms to go to rust, and the whole defenses of the country to perish, but for that proviso in the law which gives the executive officer the privilege to keep up, by anticipation, the means to defend and protect the country; and it was under this that that deficiency accrued.

One word now upon the subject of these custom-house appropriations. The Senator from New York implies a censure against the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury cannot use money, although appropriated, unless he has it. It may be in the statute; the law may authorize him to use it; but if he has not the money, he cannot use it. If the law imposes on him the duty of making certain payments, and also authorizes him to erect certain public buildings, and he has not enough to do all, he must stop and select that which is most imperative, that which is most important to the public interest, in doing which the putting up of gaols, building of court-houses, custom-houses, and post offices has been neglected, as it ought to be neglected, until we are able to do it. If the country had had an overflowing Treasury, no doubt all these buildings would have been put up. Why, sir, more than twenty applications have come to us at this session of Congress for appropriations for post offices and court-houses, and all have been rejected. Others, which were passed at the last Congress, have not been built. Why? Because we had not the means to do it. The public accommodation may require it; but we must proceed, as the Spaniards say, poco-a-poco, little by little, step by step; do it according to the means we have, and I see no cause for censure or complaint against any executive officer for not putting up a building when he has not the money to pay for it, although it may be appropriated nominally on the statute-book.

Mr. TOOMBS. The complaint made by the Senator from New York is a very extraordinary one, and his amendment is of a very extraordinary character. The truth is, it is entirely illogical and ludicrous. Congress appropriates a large amount of money, say $70,000,000; the Treasury falls short $20,000,000; and you complain of the Secretary of the Treasury for not spending the $70,000,000 when he has not got the money. That is the whole complaint. Congress makes its appropriations, estimating the revenue; the revenue falls short, but the appropriations do not; the appropriations stand, but the $70,000,000 do not come into the Treasury; and now complaint is made that the Secretary does not spend the money that he has not got. That is the whole of the Senator's complaint. But he says that the Secretary has bought a site for some of those buildings. If there was enough to execute a portion of the duty, to fulfill the law in part, which would he have done first? Would he have the Secretary build the house and then buy the site, or first buy the site and then build the house? I think the Secretary of the Treasury commenced at the right end. I think he ought to have bought the site before he built the house. The complaint seems to be, however, according to the Senator, that a friend of one of the Departments here has got pay for the site, and that the public has not got the accommodation of the building. How could the public get the accommodation without having a site on which to put the building? Is there any justice in the Senator's complaint, unless he was to build the house before he bought a place to put it on?

The amendment ought not to pass. It calls on the Secretary to execute such laws. Find him the money. It is no interest of the Secretary not to execute the laws, and pay out money as you direct him; but the difficulty is, that he has not got the money. When you have appropriated $75,000,000, and there are but $50,000,000 in the Treasury, it is the duty of the executive Government to apply the money first to those objects of most important public necessity; and therefore the completion of buildings nearly completed, where the public would lose by delay, would be the first object in this class of expenditures; and last of all would be to put up new court-houses and new custom-houses. Use the old ones, or use none. All these appropriations were very injudicious. They were the least necessary to carry on the Government. I admit it is the duty of the executive officer to execute them if you find him the means; but it is his right and his duty, when there is not money enough in the Treasury for all the objects of expenditure, to apply the money first to those most important. He cannot do all. He must do some. I suppose he does not judge as the Senator from New York does. He wants the Secretary to do something in his neighborhood. But the Secretary is an officer of the whole country; and, in his judgment, (the only place where the discretion can be,) that object can wait until the money comes. If he gets it soon, I have no doubt he will perform the duty.

Mr. KING. I suppose I shall not be required to furnish understanding to the Senator from Georgia, who has chosen to misunderstand the facts of this case, and of course thus to misstate them. I will read the law. On the 16th August, 1856, a law was passed containing this provision:

"Sec. 18. And he it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed the following buildings."

And then it goes on to enumerate them, and appropriates the money. When this law was passed, in August, 1856, and for a year after that period, there was a large surplus of money in the Treasury. The money which was appropriated by Congress for these objects was in the Treasury. My complaint is that the Secretary of the Treasury has diverted it to other purposes, and used it for objects for which he was not authorized to use it by any act of Congress, and has refused to carry out the law of Congress. That is the allegation I make.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator from New York tell me for what object not authorized by law the Secretary has used money? I am not aware of anything of that kind.

Mr. KING. I will tell you what I consider acts that are not authorized by law. Wherever he has used money for a purpose for which no appropriation was made, he has there undertaken to exercise his discretion. The deficiency bill which was brought in here at the commencement of the session for some eight or nine million dollars, the greater part of which was for the alleged Utah war, was evidence of large amounts of money used for purposes for which no act of appropriation had been passed.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but he is certainly mistaken. Not a cent of that was paid until there was an appropriation. The Government was made liable by contracts.

Mr. KING. Precisely.

Mr. HUNTER. But not a cent was used until it was appropriated.

Mr. KING. The officer could not pay the money out of the Treasury, but he would make contracts. That is the very thing I complain of; that instead of using money for objects for which Congress had directed him to use it, he makes contracts and comes here to procure from Congress a vote to authorize him to pay money for the purpose to which he has appropriated it and to which Congress has not.

Mr. HUNTER. They were not contracts made without authority of law, except, perhaps, it may be said, those made by the surveyor general of California.

Mr. KING. Five hundred thousand dollars of this very amendment, offered by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, it is alleged by the Senator from New Hampshire, was contracted without authority of law, and in express violation of the act of 1820, and the chairman of the Committee on Finance states that he has not examined the question, and does not know how the fact is. I have not examined it, and do not know.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Cobb did not make the contract.

Mr. BRODERICK. Will the Senator from New York yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRODERICK. I can state that the Secretary of the Treasury paid $110,000 in California, without any authority of law, and very unjustly, too. I have been trying, since I have held a seat here, to ascertain by what authority of law he paid it, and I have not yet been able to ascertain.

Mr. HUNTER, and others. What was the case?

Mr. BRODERICK. It was the case of a settlement between a gentleman by the name of Eldridge and the Department, where the Secretary of the Treasury paid $110,000 to Mr. Eldridge to take the buildings off the Government's hands, while another party was in possession, and a lease had been made to him by the collector of the port of San Francisco. There was no authority of law for it. In the first place, the Department paid $75,000 to erect the building. They paid the party $450,000 in six years for rents; and in the end paid him $110,000 to take the property off the hands of the Government.

Mr. KING. It is this unregulated discretion, this arbitrary power and authority assumed by the executive department in relation to the expenditures of the Treasury, to which I object; that, instead of pursuing the laws and executing them, they go on to use the public funds for such purposes as they choose, and then call upon Congress in cases where they have not been authorized by appropriations, or by special direction of the statute, to ratify their action by appropriating for a deficiency. The Treasury of the nation should be under the control of Congress; but there may be instances in which the executive department is called upon to make expenditures, and to take the responsibility; and where that is the case they should report the facts to Congress, and in such a case I should never object to meeting the liability. But the point here is, whether the executive department, with the money in the Treasury, can refuse to execute the laws of Congress which have been passed a year in advance for them? This is so. We all know that the Secretary of the Treasury, under the discretion which existed with him, paid some ten or twelve million dollars of public debt at an advance of from ten to seventeen per cent. premium. Large premiums were paid to wealthy capitalists for the debts; while at the same time the appropriations which were made by Congress must, in his discretion, go unexecuted. I object to that arbitrary discretion which undertakes to say that an appropriation made by Congress in the distribution of these necessary buildings for purposes wanted for the public in all quarters of the country, shall be used here, and shall not be used there.

Here in the amendment of the Finance Committee is $300,000 for the custom-house at New Orleans. I do not say they do not need it; I dare say they do need it. Here is also $300,000 for the custom-house at Charleston. I know nothing about the facts; I dare say they want it to carry out contracts. Here is also $500,000 for the Treasury building. I bring to your attention some small appropriations of fifty or one hundred thousand dollars for a few remote places on the frontiers, in which the Secretary has not only been authorized to erect the buildings, but all discretion has been, by the statute itself, taken from him. He is authorized and directed to do it. Now, by what authority does he withhold the money and appropriate it for other purposes? That is what he has done. He has not failed to use the money because he did not have it, I would say to the Senator from Georgia, but he has taken the money which was in the Treasury, and bought up from brokers and bondholders the bonds which they held; he has paid an enormous premium for those bonds, and thus diverted the use of these funds; and it is that arbitrary discretion of which I complain. There may be cases where he wants to use the funds for necessary purposes. To that I would not object; but I say he should be required, and Congress should hold him to accountability, for carrying out and executing laws which they pass, and which they direct him to execute, and which he has had full ability to execute.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will certainly relieve the Senator from New York from any obligation to furnish me any brains in this case, because I have seen nothing in that Senator's course which indicated that he could spare any. It has not been shown that the Secretary of the Treasury has, in any instance, spent one dollar other than by law; and I undertake to say no such case can be shown. I am quite certain the Senator from California is mistaken in the case he suggested, for I happen to know something about that. That case of Eldridge grew out of a lease which had been made many years before of certain buildings. I happen casually to know it from the fact that a person interested in it mentioned the subject to me. When the buildings were given up, the question of that settlement was under a lease already existing, and under which, I believe, from recollection, the houses were put up, and it was done in direct conformity to law, and the contract was made in pursuance of law. I do not recollect the particulars, but I know Mr. Eldridge's case was of that kind.

Mr. BRODERICK. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TOOMBS. Certainly.

Mr. BRODERICK. In 1852, Mr. Eldridge made a contract with the Government to erect a building for a warehouse. The collector of customs, Mr. King, was directed to pay him $72,000 to erect the building, so that he did not take a dollar out of his own pocket. The Government then paid $6,000 a month for four years, I believe. The Government had appointed an appraiser, and Mr. Eldridge, or his agent in California—for I believe at that time he was on this side of the mountains—had appointed another appraiser, and they were adjudicating the matter at the very time when the news arrived in San Francisco that Mr. Cobb had settled with Mr. Eldridge for $110,000. Just before that settlement was made, the collector of the customs subleased the building to a gentleman by the name of Hickey. After advertising for contracts, Mr. Hickey got the building, and the collector entered into a contract with him to pay him $250 a month as a bonus for taking the building off the Government's hands. A few weeks subsequently, Mr. Hickey was ejected from the building, after making the contract with the collector. It seems, then, that the collector of customs in San Francisco, the gentleman who made the sublease to Mr. Hickey, did not know anything about this matter. The former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Guthrie, refused to settle with these parties; and I believe the settlement was made without the knowledge of any of the Representatives or Senators from California.

Mr. TOOMBS. I only know that that question was brought before the Department as I said, and settled, I have no doubt, according to law. If the Senator from California desires to know how it was, let him introduce a resolution asking for it, and no doubt he can get it in a moment.

Mr. BRODERICK. I introduced a resolution of inquiry some three weeks since, wherein I made serious charges against the San Francisco postmaster, and I have never heard anything about the resolution since. Objections were made at the time to the phraseology of my resolution. I allowed gentlemen to put it in such a shape as they pleased. It finally passed unanimously, but I have never heard a word from the Postmaster General since, and I therefore am tired of introducing resolutions of inquiry addressed to the Departments.

Mr. YULEE. I can explain that matter to the Senator from California. An answer to his resolution is in the course of preparation; but I will state to the Senator that his resolution called for information in relation to a matter, the copying of the papers of which would require the time of two clerks for four or five months; and if he expects a report to be made on such a case within two weeks he has not appreciated the magnitude of the task he has imposed on the Department.

Mr. TOOMBS. I beg to be relieved from the idea of going into another class of cases. The particular case I was on, was in reference to the course of the Secretary of the Treasury, with whom I am better acquainted than with the Postmaster General; but I have no doubt the Senator from California will find, when he gets his information, that it is all right. At all events, I shall reserve my opinion until I see the evidence, it not being my habit to form a judgment until I know the facts.

The amendment of the Senator from New York, to which I have objected, is in these words:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is required to execute the provisions of the acts of Congress, approved August 16, 1856, and March 3, 1857, authorizing and directing the said Secretary to cause to be constructed buildings therein mentioned for custom-house and post office purposes, and for the accommodation of the courts of the United States; and the appropriations made by the said acts are continued for the purpose of the execution of the said provisions of said laws."

I again state, that one of the reasons why they have not progressed with them, is the want of money in the Treasury. Certainly, as to those directed to be built by the act of March 3d, 1857, they could hardly have been commenced by this time, even if the money had been in the Treasury. If they stopped after giving the Senator's friend the pay for the site of the building, which I take to be the first step, then it was certain the money in the Treasury was short; and it is certain that was the reason the Secretary of the Treasury gave why these appropriations have not been carried out. He states, in his report, that the money in the Treasury being short, he applied it first to the most pressing objects of public necessity. The money is not in the Treasury now; and I believe it has not been provided with very great alacrity by the Congress of the United States, or at least not without a good deal of grumbling.

As to the cases of misapplication to which the Senator alluded, I say he has failed to exhibit, and he cannot exhibit, a case in which one dollar has been expended without authority of law. The cases he put as to the deficiency bill, are not only not cases where money has not been spent illegally, but they are cases where it has not been spent at all. I should suppose it would not take the application of a great deal of brains to determine that when the officers come here for deficiencies of appropriation for authority to spend money for particular objects, it is very clear that they had not spent the money, or they would not come here. In the very case to which the Senator alluded, the officer came here with a report showing that he had not expended a dollar; but he said the public interests required a certain expenditure for which there was no appropriation, and he came here and asked for authority of law to make contracts. I know that was the case with the deficiency bill. I did not approve of many of the items of that bill. The evidence was laid before the Senate showing the state of the case in regard to it; and therefore I think the allegation is gratuitous that money has been expended for purposes not warranted by law, or that it was diverted from an express appropriation, and used for purposes for which it was not appropriated. That I understand to be the charge of the Senator from New York, and I say that charge is unfounded. The taking up of the public debt was authorized by law. The Secretary of the Treasury had a right to use the public money for that object to such an extent as he deemed proper. The fact that the falling short of the revenues in September and October, was not foreseen, was a mistake into which thousands of the Senator's constituents and the whole country fell. It resulted from the universal breakdown in the city of New York, and throughout that section of the United States. He had a right to use money to take up the public debt. That process had been going on for years. Thirty-five million dollars had been expended before under the law for that purpose, and the present Secretary of the Treasury I believe expended less than five million dollars for it. Here were appropriations standing over of fifteen or twenty million dollars, and he had to select those which were most pressing, unless all the dollars in the Treasury were expressly appropriated for building unnecessary post offices, court-houses, and custom-houses, which had not been commenced at all. I say the Senator cannot maintain the allegation he makes, he cannot show that one dollar has been applied against law, and the whole result of the complaint is that there was not enough money in the Treasury to meet the appropriations made by Congress; and there will not be enough now, if the Senator from New York and his friends here can succeed. They would appropriate $600,000 for which they have not borrowed and for which they do not estimate that the revenue will be sufficient. He will offer or sustain no amendment here to give the Secretary of the Treasury means to carry out an appropriation to improve rivers and harbors for which he votes. It will certainly never be done in the present condition of the Treasury unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall suppose these are the most proper objects to which to appropriate a deficient fund, which I do not think likely. These gentlemen seem willing enough to appropriate, but they are very unwilling to raise the means, particularly by way of loan, and yet they call on the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the laws of Congress appropriating money. Put the money there, and he has no object or motive not to carry out the law as declared by Congress, and I have no doubt no case can be shown in which he has ever applied a single dollar except in conformity of law, and he is ready to apply money as you please when he finds it appropriated, if he has it.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Georgia says the Secretary has not spent this money, because it was not appropriated; that he did not have the money to pay. The profligate who runs in debt, and contracts a debt that his friends or country have to pay for him has, in my judgment, spent money. The contracts are made, and they come here and ask Congress for appropriations upon the ground that the honor, the faith of the country is pledged to pay the money; and yet the Senator from Georgia tells me that the money has not been spent.

Mr. TOOMBS. Allow me to correct the Senator on a plain matter of fact. Did not the officer say it was not contracted for—not a dollar of it? You state a fact directly in the face of the statement of the Treasury officer. Then it makes a mere issue of veracity between you and him. He says he has not done it.

Mr. KING. The excuse of the chairman of the committee is, that contracts for $500,000 in this very amendment were made by the predecessor of the present Secretary of the Treasury. We are told that contracts have been made, and the obligation to pay has been created, and the avails of these expenditures have been received by the Government, and therefore there is a necessity to pay them in all such cases; and where that has been done, even though it had been a pretty hard case—

Mr. TOOMBS. That is a different class of cases.

Mr. KING. I am speaking of all cases, and I say that is the course of the Administration on this subject.

Mr. TOOMBS. Were these contracts made in conformity with law or against it?

Mr. KING. If they were made in anticipation of appropriations by Congress, they were made, in my judgment, against law, and they ought not to have been made; and the act of 1820, quoted by the Senator from New Hampshire this morning, expressly declares that no contract of this sort shall be made until an appropriation shall have been made to carry it out. I have not examined the facts in reference to these particular appropriations; but with regard to that allegation in respect to $500,000 in this very amendment, the chairman of the Finance Committee tells us he has not examined it, and does not know whether there was any authority of law to make contracts or not. The presumption is that there was not. It is not claimed by the Administration side, by the executive officers, or the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that this was a matter authorized by any appropriation at any rate.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator must not make them responsible for what I say. The Senator from New Hampshire asked if there was not a prohibition. I told him I had not examined into that question; that I did not know whether these contracts were made in opposition to law, or whether they were authorized by the particular laws appropriating the money authorizing the buildings. I should presume, if looked into, it would be found that they were made according to law. I merely meant to say I had not personally examined the question to see whether they were made according to law.

Mr. KING. Precisely; nor have I examined these particular cases, but I speak of the appropriations in the whole. My object in offering my amendment was to provide for the execution of laws which have been passed. Congress have been very liberal in taking care of the expenditures, and I regard that as an expenditure when the debt has been contracted, and the obligation to pay assumed; I consider that money spent, and money pretty badly spent generally. I think it a great deal better to observe the good old rule—pay as you go, and make contracts after Congress has had the ability to advise on the subject and make appropriations to provide for them; then they are able to meet them. One of the causes of the difficulties in reference to our finances is, that the prodigality of expenditure, this looseness of practice on the part of the Executive Departments of the Government for the last few years, has been gone into, and money has been expended without deeming it necessary to consult Congress beforehand on the subject, claiming that they were carrying out the purposes of the law, and all that. There was a law passed in 1842, I believe—which, in my judgment, ought to be repealed at once—authorizing the heads of Departments to transfer from one item of appropriation to another. It was passed through Congress at that time on the pretense that in the Executive Departments of the Government there were appropriations made for fuel, and stationery, and lights; for in the earlier days our appropriations were much more specific than now, and that occasionally the appropriations for these items would be too much for one and too little for another, and it would be a great convenience to allow these small amounts to be transferred from one account to another; but it was not designed at the time that we should give authority to the Secretaries to transfer appropriations from objects designed to be accomplished by Congress, and thus to defeat entirely a law of Congress, and take those moneys for other purposes, or exercise his discretion and decline to make contracts for purposes authorized by Congress, so that the law is defeated by the appropriation lapsing in two years. If this practice be allowed, a veto is given to the Secretaries as well as to the President of the United States, and a law may be utterly defeated by the failure of the Secretary to apply the money in his discretion, on the ground that it is wanted for other purposes. None of this discretion should exist in the Executive Departments, in my judgment; and I do not think, on a fair and proper administration of the Government, any of it does properly exist. Why has not the Secretary made these contracts for the purposes authorized by law? I ask for the execution of a law passed in 1856—passed at a time when we had an overflowing Treasury.

We are not left to presumption in this matter. The Senator from Georgia talks as if the Secretary were going to execute the laws and I were assailing him because he has not been in a condition to execute it as quickly as I desire. Why, sir, the chairman of the Committee on Finance tells us that these appropriations are less important, that they are not wanted, and that they may go by the board, lapse into the Treasury; that is the plan, as I understand him; and thus these appropriations are to be absolutely defeated, and a new act of Congress to be required to construct these buildings which the Secretary was directed to construct two years ago.

Now, sir, in reference to the economy which the Senator from Georgia advocates a great deal, I approve of it, and in the main I go with him on those matters; but there is a certain class of cases upon which he and his friends do not consult economy. When $10,000,000 are asked for the purchase of the Mesilla valley, for the purpose of enabling them to get a Pacific railroad a little further south; or when $200,000,000 are asked for the purchase of Cuba; or when any money is wanted for any purpose connected with that interest; I find the consciences and judgments and constitutional constructions of these gentlemen stretching to any extent whatever.

The appropriations which I seek to have carried out are very small and very few. The locality which has induced me to move this amendment is one for which I believe no appropriation was ever made before. It is on the frontiers of the country, under the guns of a British fort, with as patriotic a population, in my opinion, as there is anywhere on the face of the earth, and as true friends to their country. Although all the personal favoritism there is in the matter has already been executed, and the site has been bought, and the party got his money for the land, the Secretary has chosen to let the public go unaccommodated.

Mr. PUGH. Where is that? Ogdensburg?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir. I think the amendment I have proposed is just and proper, and ought to be adopted; but it is for the Senate to determine. I have stated the reasons which have induced me to offer it.

Mr. PUGH. I wish to say just two or three words in reference to this matter. I voted to add this section to the appropriation bill at the session of 1856; and I really voted under a mistake of the exact question, not understanding it. I desired an opportunity to reconsider; but I was assured that it was not material, for the House of Representatives would not agree to it, and the committee of conference would throw it out; but it did not so turn out. I believe the appropriations ought never to have been made; and I am glad they have not been expended. I shall vote against this provision as a set-off to the vote I gave before. I believe my vote carried the section then, for it had only one majority.

Mr. DAVIS. I listened to the remarks of the Senator from New York with some surprise, for he seemed to proceed on the supposition that the contracts were made without any reference to appropriations. As I understand the system, contracts are made, according to specifications, for a building; an estimate is sent to Congress as to the cost of the building; and if Congress choose to appropriate a certain amount of money for expenditure within the year, sometimes a member, who has paid no attention to what he was doing, will afterwards rise, and say he thought it was to complete the building, when in fact he had before him the whole amount it would cost to complete the building, and, declining to vote the money at the time, chose to vote the amount which might be expended within the year. It is a system by which we endeavor to present an economical table to keep down the appropriations of the year. It is no saving of money; it frequently involves a greater expenditure of money, as I endeavored to explain when offering an amendment to increase the amount appropriated for the extension of the Capitol to-day. Upon the specifications, however, which are presented for the construction of a building, on an estimate which has always been submitted to Congress, a contract is made with some individual to deliver a particular quantity of material; he is notified as to the amount of the appropriation, and he is called upon to deliver a certain amount of materials; and the practice of those with whom I have been associated has always been to warn them to deliver not beyond the amount there was money to pay for; but a contractor will generally take the risk. He has seen the action of Congress—that they were appropriating, not to complete the building, but for the expenditure of the year; and he anticipates a further appropriation. It is more convenient for him to continue his delivery of material; and he will usually take the risk of another appropriation. The executive officer is not responsible; he is not compelled to pay the money to the contractor. If Congress chose to cut off the appropriation, and leave the building unfinished, the contractor would have no redress save by petition to Congress for damages. I think that will be found to be the case in every one of the instances which have been cited here of the delivery of material beyond the ability of the appropriation to pay. We reverse the rule which the Senator from Texas applies to statutory; we view these questions at a distance. He requires the statutory, which was to be elevated to a great height, and viewed at a distance, to correspond with his criticism made on the level of the eye. He cannot regard favorably a material which would be reduced to the thickness of paper when put at its proper elevation, because, when he brought his eye in contact with it, it was too thick. Now, the Senator from New York reverses the rule, where, in fact, the rule ought not to be reversed, but to have its original application. He should come to the examination of the case; and, before proceeding to judge, he should bring his eye to the level of the contract, and endeavor to discover whether the contractor was authorized to deliver material not provided for in the appropriation, or whether the appropriation was made to complete the building, and it was expected to cover the delivery of all the material required, or was only for one year's expenditure, and that year's expenditure paid for as far as required, and the material delivered beyond the requisition of the officer in charge. I think that will be found to be the fact.

Mr. KING. I did not think it material to go into the particulars in reference to any specific transaction. That these immense expenditures were made antecedent to the appropriation by Congress is conceded on all hands; and yet that appropriations made by Congress are not expended, is a fact demonstrated by the proposition which I make. But in reference to the appropriations which are authorized by law and directed to be made, it is the duty of the Department, in their estimates, to present them to us and give us an opportunity to have them. It is not for them to say "these are appropriations; we are not disposed to carry them out, and therefore we will furnish no estimate."

Mr. DAVIS. I was not answering that branch of the Senator's argument.

Mr. KING. It is unanswerable, I think.

Mr. BELL. I hope some gentleman, either the Senator from Virginia, or the Senator from Mississippi, will answer the other branch of the argument, for it seems to me it involves a matter of principle of serious importance. If I understand the course of the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject, he has assumed to exercise a dispensing power, and to say that where appropriations are authorized by law and duties cast upon him by law, he has a right, according to his own judgment of what the public interest requires, to select some and execute them, and to reject others and say he will not execute them, without regard to the condition of the Treasury. That is a dispensing power which I think dangerous.

Mr. DAVIS. I really did not think that question worth while to answer. It is the clearest case, to my mind, in the world, that an executive officer who finds an appropriation which he cannot apply for the public interest, should not apply it. If he finds, from any cause whatever, that he cannot expend money judiciously, he should not undertake to expend it merely because the appropriation has been made.

Mr. BELL. No person of any sense, I suppose, would ever think of such a proposition as that. I wish the honorable Senator to understand what my proposition is. Here were certain appropriations made in 1856, a positive direction given to the Secretary of the Treasury to have certain public buildings constructed within limited prices, and the money appropriated within those limits; and in addition thereto a competent sum to buy sites. That was the general and definite appropriation, and ten per cent. was added to all that to pay superintendence, and other expenses of a similar nature. The money was appropriated in 1856, simply upon the condition and proviso—a very proper one—that the Secretary of the Treasury should not be at liberty to expend this money, or to proceed in the construction of these buildings, until the Legislatures of the respective States in which they were authorized to be constructed should release the Government from taxation forever. In some instances (in one, I think I may say I know) that release was given in proper time, and when there were about twenty million dollars surplus in the Treasury at the end of the month of June of the last fiscal year, when there was no anticipation of any difficulties in the monetary affairs of the country, no expectation of a deficiency in the Treasury. But, notwithstanding all that, the Secretary of the Treasury chooses to exercise a dispensing power in regard to that law.

The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] has gone further than any other gentleman in this debate. He says he thought they were improper and injudicious laws anyhow; and in the case of these appropriations in 1856, he actually intended to move a reconsideration; but was prevented from doing it because he was told the House of Representatives certainly would not pass them. He thinks the appropriations were injudicious, and ought never to have passed. I suppose that is superadded to the other arguments which have been used, that executive officers ought to have some discretion where they think the public interest would not, on the whole, be promoted. Who is to judge of what the public interest requires? That is the gist of the question. Is it Congress, or is it the Executive? If Congress, instead of three or four hundred thousand dollars, (I do not know the amount,) had appropriated $10,000,000, they had the power to do so. They do it at their discretion, under their responsibility to their constituents and their country. It is not for either the President or the Secretary of the Treasury, it seems to me, unless some discretion be vested in them by the law itself, to exercise a dispensing power in regard to one or all these objects. It is a violation of principle for an officer of the Government, who is directed to execute an act of Congress, to say that he thinks the public interest would not be much advanced by it. He does not put it on the ground that, until this revulsion took place, there was no money in the Treasury. Everybody knows there was a surplus. Everybody knows that the tariff which was passed at the very close and heel of the session, the last night of the last session, without debate or consideration scarcely of any sort, was passed on the ground that they anticipated $50,000,000 of excess last year, unless that act were passed; and that was contemplated to reduce it only fifteen or twenty million dollars. Some said more, and some less. Some experienced financiers thought the reduction of duties, in the condition of the trade of the country, might increase the revenue instead of diminishing it, inasmuch as it would tend to bring in a greater amount of foreign merchandise.

Now, the point I mean to urge is, what justification, what excuse in principle, can be made for the exercise of that dispensing power by the Secretary of the Treasury? I do not mean anything particularly with regard to him, because I suppose it has the approval of the President; but, I ask, what authority has the President to authorize the exercise of such dispensing power? I have not said anything on this subject heretofore, because whatever might have been the circumstances under which this omission took place when there was money in the Treasury, I supposed that, in fact, now, in the condition of the public finances, it would be proper that the localities which felt a particular interest in them, the public service not being apparently suffering, should not, under the circumstances of the country, press them. But since the question has been stirred, and debate has arisen, doctrines have been avowed that I do not think can be sustained. The justification set up by the Senator from Ohio, I do not think—

Mr. PUGH. I said that was good enough justification for my vote—not anybody else's.

Mr. BELL. But this seems to be the notion that prevails generally, so far as we may judge from the debate that has taken place.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Tennessee is very much mistaken, I think, if he supposes any of us believe there is a dispensing power in the Secretary of the Treasury or the President of the United States, to abstain from carrying out a law of Congress. I will venture to say that if there had been any money in the Treasury, the Secretary of the Treasury would have carried out every work for which there was an appropriation.

Mr. BELL. I made my remarks predicated on the confident understanding that there was abundance of money, a surplus in the Treasury, but yet he did not proceed.

Mr. HUNTER. There was no necessity for his proceeding at once. Everybody knows that this crisis came on the country unexpected, though there were some who might have been sagacious enough to foresee it. Does the Senator suppose that the Secretary of the Treasury supposed the Treasury was to be in this condition when he was buying in stock? It came upon all of us unexpectedly. Now he has not money enough to meet all appropriations. He has to select. Here is one class of appropriations for which the Government faith is pledged. If he does not expend money on them, the faith of the Government is violated. Here is another class of appropriations for which the public faith is not pledged, and in discriminating between them, he chooses to take those which will save public faith, and if he does not expend on the others, it is because he has not means to expend on them. If he had, I believe he would have applied the money to every one of them.

Mr. BELL. Under those circumstances, I should impute no blame to him. That was after he had time to see the condition of the country; but he had six or eight or nine months within which to make contracts and commence the construction of the buildings, when the Treasury was not only full, but it was supposed that it would continue full. After the revulsion commenced, the Secretary acted on the general supposition that many did that it was a mere panic, that there was no reason for it. After he became convinced there was some reason for it, he might have been justified in his action; but still up to that time he had abundance of money.

Mr. HUNTER. No doubt the Secretary intended during the fiscal year to commence it in good time. It does not follow that when you make an appropriation you are to commence the expenditure the day after. There is a reasonable discretion.

Mr. BELL. My friend is wrong again. The fiscal year was 1856-57; but this appropriation did not extend to any one year. He might not choose to execute it in the year, if he could not find the means of making what he thought an available and judicious contract. He might assume that as a ground.

Mr. SLIDELL. Will the Senator from Tennessee permit me to make an explanation on this subject? In all these cases of appropriations for custom-houses, and court-houses, there are certain preliminaries which occupy, necessarily, a great deal of time. First, the Secretary of the Treasury has to apply to the different officers of the Government, in that section of the country, for their advice in relation to the proper sites to be selected. He has a report upon that subject. He probably may send a commissioner to examine. I have had some little experience, and I am enabled to state, that in objects which the Secretary of the Treasury was not only willing, but anxious to carry out, very great delay occurred from that cause. Then, when the site is fixed upon, and the price is agreed to, but no actual contract made, it is necessary to obtain a cession of jurisdiction from the State in which that site is situated, and an exemption from taxation. All these preliminary formalities must be passed through before any expenditure is made on the work.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And then the plans have to be agreed upon.

Mr. SLIDELL. Yes, sir. I think this explanation will entirely satisfy the Senator from Tennessee that there was no intentional evasion on the part of the Secretary. I will venture to say that, in every case, he has exercised the proper diligence to carry into effect the will of Congress, until he discovered that the state of the Treasury was such as made it imperatively necessary to suspend all these works.

Mr. TOOMBS. To show you the singular inappropriateness of the course of the Senator from New York in moving this amendment, implying censure on the Secretary of the Treasury, he has not heretofore called on the Secretary to know why these particular works have not been built. Here he calls upon him to execute the law of 1856 and 1857. I have the act of 1856 here, and I will take some of these appropriations. I will take the State of Tennessee. There was one for Knoxville. It was passed in August, 1856. I believe the Legislature of Tennessee did not meet until November, 1857. I will ask my honorable friend from Tennessee if I am right in that?

Mr. BELL. It met in the fall of the same year.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Legislature of Tennessee met last November, eighteen months after the passage of the appropriation.

Mr. BELL. I said I had not inquired into what were the causes, because, in the present condition of the country, I was not disposed to press it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I was merely calling the attention of the Senate to the injustice of such an amendment, implying censure without knowing a single fact about it. It was very easy for the Senator from New York to call on the Secretary of the Treasury to know why he had not executed the acts of 1856 and 1857, instead of introducing an amendment to compel him to do it, without ever taking the trouble to ascertain why it was not done. The law of 1856 provides—

"That no money hereby appropriated shall be used or applied for the purposes mentioned, until a valid title to the land for the site of such buildings, in each case, shall be vested in the United States, and until the State shall also duly release and relinquish to the United States the right to tax or in any way assess said site, or the property of the United States that may be thereon during the time that the said United States shall be or remain the owner thereof."

Therefore, I say, as a part of this case, that it was impossible for Mr. Cobb, without violating the law, to have moved a peg, in reference to a portion of these sites, until within the last ninety days, or since the Tennessee Legislature met. I do not know that they ceded title then. They may have done so. That is to be inquired into at the Treasury Department. There is another clause of the act of 1856 which may exclude some of these appropriations. Here it is:

"Provided, That no money shall be expended under this act for the erection of a custom-house where the duties collected do not equal the expense of collection."

I think it very likely that under that provision some of these custom-houses will never be built; and yet the Senator from New York calls upon the Secretary of the Treasury to execute the law. If he means to build the custom-houses—

Mr. KING. To execute the law with all its conditions.

Mr. TOOMBS. It ought then to appear to the Senate of the United States that the Secretary has failed or refused to do so before the adoption of this amendment. The non-building of those custom-houses may be an execution of the law. It has not been made to appear by that Senator that the law has not been executed, because it has not been made to appear that the preliminary measures which were necessary before he could expend a single dollar without violating a law, have ever taken place; and it does not appear that it could have taken place. This was appropriated on the 3d of March, 1857. It was impossible to get the assent of his own State, whose Legislature did not meet until the November or December afterwards.

Mr. KING. They meet on the first Tuesday of January.

Mr. TOOMBS. Until January, the act of 1857 could not be executed.

Mr. KING. Eighteen hundred and fifty-six.

Mr. TOOMBS. I was speaking of the second act.

Mr. KING. Exactly.

Mr. TOOMBS. I went through the act of 1856, and said that, as to all that class in the act of 1857, it was impossible to execute any of them, even in his own State, until the Legislature met in January, 1858. He could not do it. It was against the law to do it. Therefore, I say it does not appear that the Secretary has failed to execute the law, for aught that appears to the Senate. There is no fact stated that he has not, in every case, executed diligently the acts of 1856 and 1857. Before the Senate passes this amendment, which implies censure, at least it would be common justice that the Secretary should be called upon to know whether or not he has executed the law, and why he has not. Therefore, I think the amendment of the Senator from New York is out of place.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia has not as full information upon this subject as he ought to have, to speak of it in this manner. I offered this amendment, not without a knowledge, on my part, that there was a calculation of the Treasury Department to let this go by and lapse. I understand, from the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that that is the calculation and expectation in this matter, and thus the appropriation will be lost by the expiration of the time. The object of a part of this amendment is, to continue for two years the time within which the Secretary will have an opportunity to execute it, for I believe an appropriation runs two years and then lapses.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It runs three years from the time it passes.

Mr. KING. The object of this amendment is to continue the law in operation. I do not, myself, see any reasonable expectation that our Treasury is to be filled to overflowing within any reasonable time; and if the Secretary intends to exercise that discretion in reference to these appropriations, and letting them go by, I prefer to have the sense of Congress upon the fitness and propriety of them. I regarded it as a duty to take such steps in this matter as would execute the law—a duty I owe to the people who have a right to these appropriations, they having been made by Congress.

I am not in the habit of making disclaimers here. I apprehend there is no reason why I should in this case. This certainly, however, is no personal matter with the Secretary of the Treasury, or anybody else. It is a question of whether the localities for which funds have been appropriated shall have the benefit of them; whether they shall have a right given to them by act of Congress. I do not think a question of that sort is a personal question with anybody. I differ with the Secretary of the Treasury as to the propriety of his exercising this discretion. I do not think he has any, or ought to exercise any; but he thinks he has, and I have brought in this provision, which the Senator from Georgia has chosen (with a view, I suppose, to resist its passage) to regard as censure upon the Secretary of the Treasury. I certainly disapprove and differ with the Secretary of the Treasury in his construction of the law, and in his notions of what are his duties; but when I desire to bring in a resolution of censure on the Secretary, I shall bring in one, in direct terms, to do so. This resolution is for a different object than a personal controversy with the Secretary of the Treasury; though if he wants one, he may seek one any way he chooses. I do not see the necessity of disclaiming or affirming these matters; but this amendment ought not to be made, or dragged into, a personal matter at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. I rise merely for the purpose of obtaining information. In the early part of the session, I asked the Senator from Mississippi if the President and Secretary were not bound to carry out the acts of Congress; and he said they were.

Mr. DAVIS. Is the Senator going to quarrel with me?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not going to quarrel with anybody. The Senator from Georgia says that there was a qualification placed on these appropriations, making them dependent on the fact whether there was sufficient revenue collected to justify the outlay of the money. That is a reason to be assigned for delaying the appropriations.

Mr. TOOMBS. No. I say it may be so. I have not assigned any reason, for I have never heard of it until to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. You say that law required that fact to be ascertained before there should be any delay.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is it not pretty evident that he got at that fact before he made the outlay of $30,000 for the site?

Mr. KING. Not that price.

Mr. FUGIE. The cost was $8,000,

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator could have paid no attention to what I said. The amendment is to carry out the acts of 1856 and 1857; and I was offering objections against that amendment to build these custom-houses, for it might be that some of them were not authorized to be built by law. I gave an instance of one in Tennessee in which I knew the relinquishment of jurisdiction could not happen until last December.

Mr. KING. The amendment is to carry out the law. If there were any conditions not complied with, of course this amendment does not require anything which those laws did not require to be done.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am perfectly willing to intrust any officer of the Government with an appropriation made by Congress for a building anywhere; but that should be considered as binding upon the Department, or the President, or whose-soever duty it was to do it.

Mr. TOOMBS. Nobody ever disputed that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then you have a law confining appropriations for two years staring in his face, and yet he refuses to make a contract. I want to know if it is not time that Congress should jog his memory a little? I do not want to censure the Secretary. The appropriations made in these bills are generally dotted about the country; and I do not think it is a matter of discretion with the Executive to say, I will build such a one, and refuse to build another one. I think he should go forward and make a pretty fair distribution of the amount. I have noticed that there was a return made in the Secretary's report of sixteen or seventeen million dollars, the application of which was postponed to next year. I do not know but that is very proper; and when we are short of money, they may be bound to do it. When I saw that, I asked the Senator from Mississippi if he did not hold an Administration responsible to carry out the act of Congress? and he said he did. All I want to say is, that I shall vote for this appropriation, not certainly with any view of censuring anybody, but I think that any Secretary who is directed to build the building, unless there is something in the act that interfered with the performance of duty, is bound to build the building in a reasonable time. I do not say he shall build it all in one year, but that he shall take a reasonable time to discharge the duty.

Mr. DAVIS. He must get a site first.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; but it does not take a long time, with due diligence, to get a site. I have heard objections to these contracts. I know enough about making contracts for buildings to know that a Secretary would be very unwise to undertake to build such a building as the Treasury building without making contracts in advance of appropriations. No man would contract to furnish material for such a building as the Treasury building on one year's appropriation. It would ruin him. Here is a building that will probably cost two or three or more million dollars. A man, to begin with, would have to furnish stone large enough to sink a common vessel. He must make an outlay to get such massive materials, and to build ships to bring them here. He must make contracts ahead. I think it would be a strange provision of law which would prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from making contracts after Congress ordered a building to be built that should extend for more than one year. I know that you do not appropriate for more than one year, but certainly you must give some assurance to the contractor that he would continue the contract until the building was completed. I suppose everybody knows that if there is no money appropriated, there will be no pay; but I think a contract is binding on the Government when judiciously made, and not made against law or against reason, or, if against law, it is in favor of good reason and good sense that it should be made for the whole building at once.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 28, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. B. F. BITTINGER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

POST ROUTE BILL.

Mr. ENGLISH. I ask leave this morning to report, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, the annual post route bill. It is a very voluminous bill, covering sixty-five pages of large-sized paper. It will no doubt receive large additions by amendments in the Senate, and it will be a great relief to the clerks to get rid of it at an early period. As it is a bill of general interest, I hope the House will allow it to be reported this morning. I desire to put the bill on its passage at once. It has been very carefully matured, and most of the members of the House have had an opportunity of examining it.

Mr. READY. I have never seen this bill, and I must object to its being reported, unless we can have an opportunity to offer amendments.

Mr. ENGLISH. Is it in order to move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. ENGLISH. I am sure that if the gentleman from Tennessee will reflect for a moment, he will not object. If he desires amendments to be made to the bill, it can be amended in the Senate; but it ought to be introduced.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope my colleague will withdraw his objection.

Mr. READY. If I can have an opportunity to present my amendment here, I will not object.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that he should let the bill remain in the House to-day, so that members may have an opportunity to examine it, and then he can bring it up to-morrow.

Mr. ENGLISH. I propose, then, to introduce the bill now, and have it read a first and second time, and postponed until to-morrow, when I will offer such amendments as I think ought to be put in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that there might be some difficulty in getting the bill up. It would, perhaps, be better for the gentleman to withdraw the bill for the present, and let gentlemen offer such amendments as they desire to submit before the bill is introduced.

Mr. ENGLISH. Well, I withdraw the bill, and give notice to the House that, immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, I shall propose to introduce the bill and put it upon its passage; and, in the mean time, it will remain at my desk, where gentlemen will have an opportunity of examining it.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of bill (No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1859, reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, without amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and withdraw the motion to recommit the bill; and now demand the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The bill of the House (No. 243) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1859, was next taken up for consideration.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union reported it back with sundry amendments. The question pending was on the motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, upon which the previous question was demanded.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I withdraw the demand for the previous question. I also withdraw the motion to recommit, and demand the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were then read over, and such as no separate vote was demanded on were adopted in gross.

First amendment:

Page 2, in line twelve, insert as follows:

Provided, That no Army officer shall hereafter be detailed for civil duty, except wherein provided by law.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 126; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Avery, Billingshurst, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, John B. Clark, Clay, John Cochrane, Cox, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Dean, English, Gilmer, Hatch, Hopkins, Jackson, George W. Jones, Kelsey, Landy, Letcher, Lovejoy, Maciay, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Matteson, Miller, Milson, Isaac N. Morris, Nichols, Pendleton, Pettit, Phillips, Pottle, Powell, Ready, Reilly, Sandidge, Henry M. Shaw, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Vallandigham, Walbridge, Ellihu B. Washburne, White, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Arnold, Bennett, Bingham, Bishop, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Brayton, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dimmick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Edmundson, Eustis, Farnsworth, Feinton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilman, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, Hawkins, Hoard, Horton, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Huyler, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kilgore, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Lawrence, Leiter, McKibbin, McQueen, Mason, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Palmer, Parker, John S. Phelps, Pike, Potter, Purviance, Quitman, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Scott, Searing, Seward, Shorter, Singleton, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Wilson, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—126.

So the amendment was rejected.

Pending the vote,

Mr. BLISS stated that if he had been within the bar when his name was called he should have voted in the negative.

Mr. COMINS. Understanding that, if the pending amendment prevails, it will displace engineers now in charge of public works, such as forts, piers, and light-house towers, in which I take an especial interest, I vote "no."

Mr. FLORENCE. Understanding this to be a reflection upon the Army officers, I vote "no."

Mr. LETCHER. Understanding this to be a reflection upon nobody, but the embodiment of a sound and proper principle, I vote "ay."

Mr. BRANCH stated that, if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he should have voted "no."

Mr. PHILLIPS stated that his colleague, Mr. HICKMAN, was still detained from the House, in consequence of indisposition.

After the announcement of the vote as above recorded,

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the yeas and nays upon its passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Anderson, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bishop, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Comins, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, English, Eustis, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Lawrence, Letcher, Maciay, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miller, Milson, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Scott, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Vallandigham, White, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Ezra Clark, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Curtis, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wood, and Zollcoffer—81.

So the bill was passed.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. REILLY stated that his colleague, Mr. LEIDY, was detained at his room by indisposition.

Mr. MOORE stated that, if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he should have voted "ay."

Mr. PHILLIPS stated that, if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he should have voted "ay."

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, stated that, if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he should have voted for the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD stated that if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he should have voted "no."

Mr. HOARD stated that if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he should have voted against the bill.

After the announcement of the vote, as above recorded,

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAIL STEAMER APPROPRIATION BILL.

The bill of the House (No. 538) making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail, by ocean steamers and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, was next taken up for consideration. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union reported the bill back without amendment, and with the recommendation that it do pass; the pending question being upon the motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, upon which the previous question had been demanded.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and also withdraw the motion to recommit. I now demand the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question until some opportunity has been afforded for amending the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I wish to amend the bill in a single particular, to which I presume the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will have no objection.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I object.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. NICHOLS. No debate is in order, and I object to debate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Then I hope the House will vote down the demand for the previous question, and allow the bill to be amended.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I object to debate.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. CLEMENS demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, demanded tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The main question was ordered to be put.

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD demanded the yeas and nays upon the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 87, nays 106; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Bingham, Bonham, Boyce, Branch, Bryant, Burroughs, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Cobb, Cragin, James Craig, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Edmundson, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Grow, Harlan, Hill, Houston, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Smith, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Vallandigham, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Israel Washburn, Wood, Woodson, and Wortendyke—106.

So the bill was not laid on the table.

The vote then recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. BARKSDALE demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 101, nays 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Arnold, Bishop, Bliss, Bowie, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Cox, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gillis, Gilman, Gooch, Greenwood, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, William Stewart, Talbot, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Vallandigham, Wade, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburne, White, Wilson, Winslow, Woodson, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—94.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill of the House, for extending the land laws east of the Cascade mountains in Oregon and Nebraska Territories.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 170) for extending the land laws east of the Cascade mountains in Oregon and Washington Territories.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to make a very brief personal explanation this morning to the House. Yesterday, in a controversy I had with the Speaker, it is very likely that I held the floor with too much persistency; and I desire now to make an apology to the Speaker and the House for that little exhibition of feeling.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had no doubt that it was a momentary exhibition of feeling, and that the gentleman would make the reparation which he has done.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Senate have insisted upon their amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 202) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1859, and ask a committee of conference. I ask that the message may be taken up, and the request for a committee of conference agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall object. All the ras-calities of Congress are perpetrated through the means of conference committees.

Mr. SINGLETON. Will it be in order to move that the committees be called for reports?

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. LETCHER. I wish to appeal to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORGAN] to withdraw his objection to agreeing with the request of the Senate for a committee of conference on the legislative bill. The session is drawing to a close, and we have nearly all the appropriation bills to act finally on yet.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, sir, I will withdraw my objection in this instance; but I want it understood that I will not do it in another instance.

Messrs. J. GLANCY JONES, HORTON, and JACKSON, were appointed a committee of conference on the part of the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order of business.

JAMES BEATTY'S REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the Committee of Claims, reported back Senate bill (No. 57) for the relief of James Beatty's personal representatives, with the recommendation that it do not pass; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

N. AND B. GODDARD.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the same committee, reported back bill (C. C. No. 155) for the relief of N. and B. Goddard, executors of Nathaniel Goddard, with the recommendation that it do not pass; which was laid upon the table, and the adverse report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. RUSSELL.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the same committee, reported back bill (C. C. No. 83) for the relief of William H. Russell; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSIAH SHAW.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill (No. 156) for the relief of Josiah Shaw, of Bordentown, New Jersey, with the recommendation that it do not pass; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN A. W. REYNOLDS.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Captain A. W. Reynolds; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM WEER.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of William Weer; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. That is the regular order of business.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope that I will be allowed to report a couple of private claims from the Committee of Ways and Means. They are clearly right, and will pass in a few minutes. We can devote to-morrow to the consideration of private bills in a Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that this is objection day in the Committee of the Whole House, and to-morrow will not be. The gentleman can make his reports to-morrow as well as to-day.

Mr. LETCHER. I will say that, so far as these cases are concerned, there will not be objection to them in the House.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I insist on my motion.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that the bills on the Calendar would be taken up where the committee had left off on the last objection day.

MARY BLATTENBERGER.

A bill (H. R. No. 343) granting a pension to Mary Blattenberger, widow of John Blattenberger. [Objected to by Mr. SMITH, of Virginia.]

CAPTAIN STANTON SHOLES.

A bill (H. R. No. 344) for the relief of Captain Stanton Sholes.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of War to place Captain Stanton Sholes upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, at the rate of twenty dollars per month, to commence on the 1st of January, 1858.

It appears, from the report of the committee, that Sholes was a captain of an artillery company, acting under a commission from President Madison in 1812; that he was actively engaged during the war, although it does not appear that he was in any battle; that he lost his baggage by no fault of his own, but by the remissness of the Government officers. It appears further, that Captain Sholes, while in service, and while drilling his men, as an artillery officer, was knocked six or eight feet by the discharge of a 12-pounder; was picked up apparently lifeless; that when he came to himself he was entirely deaf; that he has been partially restored to his hearing, but his left ear has ever since been deaf, and it has increased in deafness with the lapse of years, until he is now an infirm old man; and for forty years past he has been obliged to seclude himself from society, being incapacitated from duty on the jury, and other duties—in fact, from all the business of life.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

NANCY MAGILL.

A bill (H. R. No. 345) for the relief of Nancy Magill, of Ohio.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Nancy Magill, widow of James Magill, of the State of Ohio, on the pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, for five years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1858.

It appears, from the report, that James Magill, the husband of Nancy Magill, enlisted as a private for the war in the company of Captain Hoagland, Colonel Morgan's regiment of infantry, on the 28th of April, 1847, was wounded at Chepultec 13th September, 1847, and discharged from the service August 4, 1848; was subsequently appointed brevet second lieutenant, and promoted first lieutenant for his bravery during the war. On the 29th March, 1849, he was compelled to resign his commission as lieutenant on account of ill health. It further appears that some time in the year 1849, after he resigned his commission as lieutenant, he left his residence in Coshocton, Ohio, for the purpose of going to Cincinnati on business, since which time he has not been heard from, although she has made diligent search and inquiry as to his whereabouts; she verily believes he is dead.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM SUTTON.

A bill (H. R. No. 346) for the relief of William Sutton.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of William Sutton on the roll of invalid pensioners, at the rate of six dollars per month, to commence from and after the 5th of February, 1858, and to continue during the period of his natural life.

It appears, from the report, that William Sutton was a private in company A, in the fourth regiment of Indiana volunteers, in the war with Mexico; that about August, 1847, while in the service and in the line of his duty, he was attacked with fever and diarrhea, which continued him on the sick list until January, 1848, when his disease, having become chronic, and having affected his nerves, destroying the sight of one eye and injuring the other, he was discharged from service as unfit for duty; that his infirmities have continued and are incurable, and partly incapacitate him to earn a livelihood by labor. His case amounts to three fourths of a total disability.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPH WEBB.

A bill (H. R. No. 347) for the relief of Joseph Webb.

The bill directs that the monthly pay heretofore allowed by law to Joseph Webb, as invalid pensioner, be increased to eight dollars per month; and that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and directed to pay Webb at that rate from and after the 1st of January, 1852.

The report shows that by a special act of Congress of the 25th of June, 1834, the said Webb was placed on the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, for disability arising from a wound received while in the service of the United States, and in the line of his duty, during the war of 1812, at the rate of six dollars per month, which rate was fixed in consequence of the certificate of surgeons that his disability was three quarters of a total disability; that said Webb further represents that the disability arising from the aforesaid wound has been for many years so much increased as to amount to a total disability; and that, on the 20th day of April, 1851, he submitted himself to the examination of two skillful surgeons, John Mason and W. H. Brown, who thereupon gave their affidavit, in due form, that said Webb's disability, arising from said wounds, was a total disability; and that, in their opinion, he was entitled to a full pension of eight dollars per month, instead of six, the sum he has been drawing under his existing pension certificate.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

EDWIN M. CHAFFEE.

A bill (H. R. No. 348) for the relief of Edwin M. Chaffee. [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.]

R. L. B. CLARKE.

A bill (H. R. No. 351) for the relief of R. L. B. Clarke. [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.]

ENOCH B. TALCOTT.

A bill for the payment of extra compensation to Enoch B. Talcott, for his services and expenses in recovering Government funds embezzled by Jacob Richardson. [Objected to by Mr. SMITH, of Virginia.]

NAHUM WARD.

A bill (H. R. C. C. No. 27) for the relief of Nahum Ward.

Objection being made, the bill was passed over.

ELI W. GOFF.

A bill (H. R. No. 353) for the relief of Eli W. Goff.

The bill directs the proper accounting officer of the Treasury, upon satisfactory proof being presented that Eli W. Goff, late inspector of customs for the district of Vermont, actually sustained damages and losses by his efforts faithfully to execute the revenue laws of the United States, to audit the account of the said Goff, and to pay to him the amount of said damages and losses thus proven, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; provided that the amount allowed Goff shall be for damages resulting directly from a proper discharge of his legal duties as inspector of customs, and shall not exceed five thousand dollars.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

CAPTAIN SAMUEL MILLER.

A bill (H. R. No. 354) for the relief of the heirs of Captain Samuel Miller. [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.]

WILLIAM EDMONDSTON.

A bill (H. R. No. 355) for the relief of the heirs of William Edmondston. [Objected to by Mr. DEAN.]

ROSWELL MINARD.

A bill (H. R. No. 356) for the relief of Roswell Minard, father of Theodore Minard, deceased.

The bill directs the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue to Roswell Minard, the father of Theodore Minard, deceased, a warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land, in lieu of bounty land warrant No. 34,754, heretofore issued to Theodore Minard, deceased, which warrant, when so issued, shall be in all respects of the same effect as the warrant No. 34,754 would have been had it been issued to said Roswell Minard: provided, however, that the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall be satisfied that said Roswell Minard is the father of Theodore Minard, deceased; that Theodore Minard died without leaving a wife or lawful children; and that Theodore Minard never assigned or transferred the bounty land warrant No. 34,754.

The second section authorizes the Commissioner of the General Land Office to institute legal proceedings, in such manner as he may deem proper, to vacate the patent issued upon the last mentioned bounty land warrant, to recover the land embraced in the patent, for the benefit of the United States, or for such other relief as he may deem suited to the case, and to cause the person or persons guilty of forging the assignment of the bounty land warrant, and all persons criminally connected with the forgery, or of uttering or passing the forged assignment, to be prosecuted for the offense; the lawful expense of which legal proceedings and prosecutions shall be paid for by the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

ABEL M. BUTLER.

A bill (H. R. No. 357) for the relief of Abel M. Butler.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to issue to Abel M. Butler, a volunteer in the company of Captain Jesse Stone, and engaged in the battles at Fort Oswego, New York, in 1813-14, a warrant or certificate for one hundred and sixty acres of land, which warrant may be located by him, his heirs or assigns, upon any of the public lands of the United States subject to private entry; and directs that upon the return of the certificate or warrant, with evidence of the location having been legally made, to the General Land Office, a patent shall be issued therefor.

It appears, from the petition, that Abel M. Butler was a volunteer in the company of Captain Jesse Stone, under Colonel Parkhurst, in April, 1813, and marched with said company to the defense of Fort Oswego, then being attacked by the British; and again, on the 5th day of May, 1814, he volunteered into said company, and fought through the battle of Oswego, again attacked by the enemy. That in May, 1855, he presented his claim to the Commissioner of Pensions for bounty land under the act of March 3, 1855, but his claim was denied for want of record evidence. It appears, from the papers on file, that the service was performed with fidelity and bravery, and by the direct and positive testimony of two of his comrades, who were in those battles in the same company, and who have received land warrants for such service.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE P. MARSH.

An act (S. No. 1) for the relief of George P. Marsh.

The bill was read.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to say that this bill is reported back from the Committee on Foreign Affairs with an amendment, and the question is upon the amendment, and not upon the bill itself.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object.

JOHN P. BROWN.

A bill (H. R. No. 360) for the relief of John P. Brown.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John P. Brown, late principal interpreter of the Turkish language to the United States legation at Constantinople, for his services as a chargé d'affaires of the United States at that court, from April 11, 1838, to July 19, 1839; from July 30, 1852, to July 5, 1853; and from December 19, 1853, to January 31, 1854; the sum of $4,674 15, it being the difference between the salary of a chargé d'affaires of the United States and the amount received by him as principal interpreter during the several periods above named.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to offer an amendment to that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be in order if there be no objection to the bill.

Mr. COX. I object.

Mr. CLAY. Cannot an amendment come in before objection is made?

Mr. COX. I withdraw the objection to hear the amendment.

Mr. CLAY. I will state the amendment, and also state why it becomes necessary for me, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, after having reported this bill, to offer an amendment before it comes to be acted on. My amendment is, to strike out, commencing in the eighth line, the words "from the 11th day of April, 1838, to the 19th day of April, 1839," and to strike out from the fourteenth line "$4,674 15," and insert in lieu thereof "$2,544 48." And now, if the committee will indulge me, as a matter of personal explanation, I wish to explain why the amendment is offered. When this case was first referred to me by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I addressed a note of inquiry to the proper Department, to ascertain whether this gentleman had rendered the service which he had alleged he had rendered, and whether he had ever received any compensation therefor. I was informed by the Department that he had rendered the service as alleged, and that he had never received any compensation therefor. I thereupon reported this bill. My attention was, however, afterwards called to the fact that a law passed some years ago had given to this gentleman compensation for part of the time for which he claims this extra compensation, and it therefore becomes necessary that the amendment shall be made.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to the bill, for I do not think he is entitled to anything.

WILLIAM RICH.

A bill (H. R. No. 361) for the relief of William Rich.

Mr. LEITER objected to the bill, but subsequently offered to withdraw the objection, when objection was made to going back.

MRS. MARY ANN HENRY.

A bill (H. R. No. 362) for the relief of Mrs. Mary Ann Henry. [Objected to by Mr. MORGAN.]

HENRY MILLER.

A bill (H. R. No. 363) granting an invalid pension to Henry Miller. [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.]

MARY A. M. JONES.

A bill (H. R. No. 42) granting a pension to Mary A. M. Jones.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mary A. M. Jones, widow of Brevet Major General Roger Jones, deceased, late Adjutant General of the Army, upon the roll of pensioners, and pay her a pension at the rate of one half the pay, monthly, to which her late husband was entitled at the time of his death; the pension to commence on the 15th of July, 1852, and continue during her natural life or widowhood.

It appears, from the report, that the petitioner is the widow of the late Brevet Major General Roger Jones, who entered the military service of his country in 1809, and so continued to the day of his death, July 15, 1852; that he served throughout the war of 1812, and was distinguished in almost every action fought on the Canada frontier; was wounded with a bayonet in one, and was twice breveted for gallantry on the field of battle; that he filled the important post of Adjutant General from 1825 to the day of his death—in the language of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, "bringing to the discharge of its highly difficult and responsible duties an intelligence, honesty of purpose, and untiring devotion, which carried him through every emergency with credit to himself and advantage to the public service." That his distinguished and valuable services during the Mexican war won for him the brevet of major general, it being the fifth brevet won by him for gallant and meritorious services. It is clearly proved by his attending physician and other testimony, that the close and continued confinement, occasioned by the accumulation of business in the Adjutant General's office during the Mexican war, impaired his health, undermined his constitution, and abridged his life; in fact, that the unintermitting and arduous labors called for by the exigencies of the public service—labors which he perseveringly and often painfully discharged at times when his enfeebled health demanded a relaxation of his official duties—were eventually the cause of his death. The petitioner was left, by the untimely death of her husband, with a family of eleven children, eight of whom are infants and daughters, without adequate means for their education and support, which has compelled her to appeal to the equity and justice of Congress for relief by way of pension.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the amount of that pension? My attention was called off at the time the bill was read.

The CHAIRMAN. One half the pay monthly to which her husband was entitled at the time of his death.

Mr. MORGAN. How much is that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to the bill, because it gives a higher pension than is given to others of the same class.

Mr. FLORENCE. This is a widow with eleven children, appealing to the country for relief.

The CHAIRMAN. The objection comes too late. The gentleman did not rise until the bill had been laid aside to be reported to the House.

MARIA B. DUSENBURY.

A bill (H. R. No. 364) for the relief of Mary B. Dusenbury. [Objected to by Mr. SMITH, of Virginia.]

JEREMIAH WRIGHT.

A bill (H. R. No. 365) granting a pension to Jeremiah Wright.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to that bill.

Mr. KELSEY. Oh, I hope the objection will be withdrawn. This is a poor old soldier, who lost his leg in the last war; and if such bills are to be objected to, we may as well rise.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The pension goes back too far.

Mr. FLORENCE. If gentlemen object to the provisions of the bill, why cannot they move to amend them, and let us do something.

Mr. KELSEY. If we cannot do anything, let us rise. I move that the committee do now rise. The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the next bill upon the Calendar. Mr. RUSSELL. I hope the bill for the relief of Jeremiah Wright will be amended so as to make it acceptable.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have no objection to its being amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has passed from the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LEITER. I object to going back, unless I can be permitted to go back and withdraw an objection which I made.

JOHN DUNCAN.

A bill (H. R. No. 366) for the relief of John Duncan.

The bill authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the list of Navy pensioners, at the rate sixteen dollars per month, the name of John Duncan, who was a landsman in the United States Navy on board the United States ship-of-war Brandywine, and who has become totally blind in consequence of disease contracted and injuries received by him while in the line of his duty in the service of the United States; the pension to commence on the 1st of December, 1855, and continue during his natural life; provided, that the pension shall not be paid if John Duncan remains a beneficiary in the United States naval asylum.

It appears, from the report, that the petitioner was a landsman in the service of the United States on board of the ship-of-war Brandywine, when under the command of Commodore F. A. Parker; that he served out his time, and was honorably discharged; that while in said service, in the month of May, A. D., 1844, a cataract formed in one eye. In July following inflammation and an abscess appeared. In the winter following the disease extended to the other eye, and he became utterly and entirely blind. That on the 20th of September, 1845, he was sent to and received in the naval hospital near Portsmouth, Virginia, and was discharged from the service on the 6th of May, 1846, blind. It further appears that the said disability occurred while he was actually in the service aforesaid, and in the line of his duty.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. With the permission of the committee, I would like to make a suggestion. [Cries of "Agreed! agreed!"] It is this: I know the gentlemen feel dissatisfied with me—not to say anything now about it—for objecting to their claims. I am willing now that they may select any claim upon the Calendar, and if they will give us a vote upon it in the House by yeas and nays, may go there. I am willing that they may discharge the committee from the whole Calendar, if, when they bring the bills into the House, they will give us a vote by yeas and nays upon any bill which the yeas and nays are called for. [Cries of "Agreed!"] I am willing that that shall be done. I do not wish here, by my objection, to thwart and defeat what the majority wish to do. But your rule is, that upon this day any bill upon the Calendar, to which there is no objection, shall be reported to the House. When a bill is read on these objection days, and a gentleman objects to the principle involved in it, if he fails to object, it is the same as if he votes for the bill.

Now, I am willing to allow the committee to be discharged from the consideration of all the bills on the Calendar, if gentlemen will give us a vote upon them when we get into the House.

[Cries of "Agreed!"]
Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I object to any such agreement.

Mr. NICHOLS. I wish to make a single suggestion. I wish to say that members upon this side of the House have manifested a disposition throughout to allow the appropriation bills to be acted on, and to give the dominant majority here a chance to perfect the public business of the country. I object to the proposition made by the gentleman from Tennessee, because it is well known that if it be agreed to, the call of the yeas and nays on half a dozen bills would terminate the private business for the session.

We can do no good to the private claimants if this disposition to object to everything continues to be manifested. I want the responsibility to rest where it belongs; and if no other gentleman objects, I object to the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

[Cries of "Read on!"]
Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. HARLAN. I object.
Mr. HOUSTON. My suggestion would be for the purpose of advancing business.

Mr. HARLAN. I know of no better way of advancing the public business than by proceeding with the Calendar.

DEPREDACTIONS OF CREEK INDIANS.

A bill (H. R. No. 367) to provide for the examination and payment of certain claims of citizens of Georgia and Alabama, on account of losses sustained by depredations of the Creek Indians.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.
Mr. KELSEY. I object to the bill.
Mr. SEWARD. I hope the gentleman will not visit upon me his dissatisfaction at having his bill objected to.

Mr. POTTLE. Objection has been made, and I call for the regular order.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I think that bill ought to have been sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DEAN. I object to debate.
Mr. SHORTER. I object, and I give notice that I shall object to every bill on the Calendar. Gentlemen are objecting here without ever hearing the bills read.

Mr. SEWARD. Then we can do no business, and I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.
Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SHORTER. No sir, I object.

PETER PARKER.

A bill (C. C. H. R. No. 85) for the relief of Peter Parker. [Objected to by Mr. SHORTER.]

Mr. GREENWOOD. If the committee will hear me, I can make a suggestion which will remove the difficulty.

Mr. POTTLE. I object to any statement, and call for the regular order.

HUGH GLENN.

A bill (H. R. No. 441) for the relief of the assignees of Hugh Glenn. [Objected to by Mr. SHORTER.]

J. C. G. KENNEDY.

A bill (H. R. No. 442) for the relief of Joseph C. G. Kennedy.

Mr. SHORTER. I object; and I shall object to every other bill that is read.

CAPTAIN MILLER.

A bill (H. R. No. 354) for the relief of the heirs of Captain Miller. [Objected to by Mr. SHORTER.]

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the committee rise; and when the House gets in a better humor we can come back again. It is evident we can do nothing now.

The motion was not agreed to.
Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask the consent of the committee to make a single statement.

Mr. POTTLE. I object.
Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. If the committee will listen for a single moment—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

JOSEPH HARDY AND ALTON LONG.

A bill (H. R. No. 444) for the relief of Joseph Hardy and Alton Long. [Objected to by Mr. SHORTER.]

Mr. TRIPPE. As the gentleman from Alabama has indicated his purpose to object to all the bills, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

ENOCH B. TALCOTT.

A bill (S. No. 77) for the relief of Enoch B. Talcott. [Objected to by Mr. SHORTER.]

SAMUEL A. FAIRCHILD.

A bill for the relief of Samuel A. Fairchild. [Objected to by Mr. SHORTER.]

Mr. GREENWOOD. I ask consent to make a statement.

Mr. POTTLE. I object.
Mr. LEITER. I hope the reading of the Calendar will be stopped where it is, until this difficulty shall have been gotten over with.

Mr. POTTLE. I object to any debate, and call for the regular order of business.

Mr. LEITER. I only wanted to make a statement for the benefit of the House.

Mr. POTTLE. I object.
Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I now wish to appeal to the committee to accept the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. DEAN. I object to that.

HALL NEILSON.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 21) for the relief of Hall Neilson. [Objected to by Mr. SHORTER.]

ELIAS HALL.

An act (S. No. 68) for the relief of Elias Hall, of Rutland, Vermont. [Objected to by Mr. SHORTER.]

SHADE CALLOWAY.

A bill (H. R. No. 386) for the relief of Shade Calloway. [Objected to by Mr. SHORTER.]

Mr. NICHOLS. It is useless to go on in this manner. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion until we have gone on for two or three bills further.

Mr. NICHOLS. I think we had better rise. I insist upon my motion.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. It is evident, sir, that we are doing wrong.

Mr. POTTLE. I object to any debate.
Mr. SEWARD. I trust we shall now go back and undo the business we have done in this way.

Mr. DEAN, Mr. POTTLE, and others, objected to debate.

D. O. DICKINSON.

A bill (H. R. No. 445) for the relief of D. O. Dickinson.

Mr. SHORTER. I object to that bill, and I shall state just this to the committee—

Mr. POTTLE. I object.
Several MEMBERS. Do not object to the statement.

Mr. POTTLE. I object; and do not withdraw my objection.

Mr. SHORTER. Very well; go on. I shall object to every bill.

MRS. JANE SMITH.

An act (S. No. 73) authorizing Mrs. Jane Smith to enter certain lands in the State of Alabama. [Objected to by Mr. SHORTER.]

Mr. EUSTIS. I move that the committee rise. The motion was not agreed to.

NEHEMIAH STOKELY.

A bill (H. R. No. 447) for the relief of the heirs of Nehemiah Stokely, a revolutionary officer.

Mr. COBB. What has become of Senate bill No. 73?

The CHAIRMAN. It was objected to.
Mr. COBB. Then I think I had better follow the illustrious example of my colleague, [Mr. SHORTER,] and object. I do object.

THOMAS WILLIAMS.

A bill (H. R. No. 448) for the relief of the legal representatives of Lieutenant Thomas Williams, a revolutionary officer. [Objected to by Mr. SHORTER.]

Mr. SEWARD. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTLE] has withdrawn his objection to the explanation which the gentleman from Alabama proposes to make to the committee.

Mr. SHORTER. I simply wish to say that when the bill to provide for the examination and payment of certain claims of citizens of Georgia and Alabama, on account of losses sustained by depredations of the Creek Indians was called, the gentleman from New York [Mr. KELSEY] objected before the bill or report was read, and of course before he could have understood anything of the merits of the bill. I thought he objected on sectional grounds, because the names of Georgia and Alabama appeared in the title. I thought it was an extraordinary course of proceeding for a gentleman to object to a bill before he could possibly understand what it was. This is a claim in which many of my constituents are interested.

Mr. SEWARD. And many of mine.

Mr. SHORTER. The payment of these claimants was recommended by General Jackson when he was President. This bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs. It has passed the Senate several times. I thought it due my constituents that legislation should not proceed on other bills if they are not to have their claims examined and allowed because they belong to a particular section. Having understood, however, that the objection of the gentleman from New York was not made on sectional grounds, I now withdraw my objections to this bill, and all the others which have been passed over since the one to which I have referred.

Mr. KELSEY. I wish to say to the committee that I did not object to the bill mentioned by the gentleman from Alabama upon any sectional grounds. I objected because I saw from the reading of the title of the bill that it contained provisions relating to many individuals, and I thought it was a bill which should not pass simply without objection and without explanation. I thought it should be maturely considered. I confess that in addition to this I felt some little irritation in consequence of an objection which was made by another gentleman to a bill in which I felt some interest for an old soldier who was maimed in battle, and which I thought ought to pass without objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from New York that I never object to a bill here in consequence of any feeling I may have towards any gentleman who may be interested in it.

Mr. KELSEY. Nor I.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I objected to the bill to which the gentleman from New York refers, because it was in conflict with the general law regulating pensions to invalid soldiers.

Mr. COBB. As my friend from Alabama objected to Senate bill (No. 73) because he was a little irritated, I hope we shall by unanimous consent, go back and take it up.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. COBB. I wish to say to the committee—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As we have gone over several bills which have not been objected to for good cause, I hope we shall, by unanimous consent, go back and take them up.

Mr. BURNETT. I object.

NATHANIEL HEARD'S HEIRS.

A bill (H. R. No. 449) for the relief of the heirs of Nathaniel Heard. [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.]

FRANCOIS GUILLORY.

A bill (H. R. No. 450) for the relief of the legal representatives of Francois Guillory. [Objected to by Mr. CLAWSON.]

Mr. STANTON. I rise to a question of order. I submit to the Chair whether it is not in order for any gentleman opposed to a bill to move that it be laid aside, with a recommendation to the House that it do not pass; and let it then be understood that when it goes to the House, the yeas and nays shall be called for.

The CHAIRMAN. It will only be in order by unanimous consent.

Mr. STANTON. If any gentleman makes a motion in lieu of the objection, would it not be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. STANTON. I think it would be right to do so.

JEAN BAPTISTE DEVIDRINE.

A bill (H. R. No. 451) for the relief of the legal representatives of Jean Baptiste Devidrine.

The bill confirms the legal representatives of Jean Baptiste Devidrine, late of Louisiana, in their claim to that tract or parcel of land known on the public surveys of the southwestern land district of that State as lot forty-five, in township four south, range three east, and lot seventy-three, in township four south, range four east; containing about four hundred arpents, or three hundred and fifty acres of land, and that a patent shall issue therefor as in other cases; provided that the act shall only be construed as a relinquishment of whatever title may be now vested in the United States, and shall in no wise interfere with any valid adverse claim of other or third parties, should such there be.

It appears, from the report, that the claim is for a tract of land in Louisiana, of ten by forty arpents, (about three hundred and fifty acres,) which, it appears, is the half of a tract of twenty by forty arpents granted to said Devidrine by Governor Galvez, in 1778. The order of survey being evidenced by the report marked B. 290, of the commissioners appointed to ascertain the rights of persons to lands in the western district of the Orleans Territory, who say, in confirming the title of Benjamin M. Stokes to a tract of four hundred and one arpents, that it is "founded on an order of survey in favor of Jean Baptiste Devidrine for twenty arpents front by forty in depth, on a petition of said Devidrine, bearing date the 22d January, 1778." It is also in evidence that the land has been regarded, by the people and the courts, as private property since 1789; having been repeatedly sold, within that time, for a valuable consideration by individuals, and under order of the probate courts.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

LAURENT MILLAUDON.

An act (S. No. 81,) for the relief of Laurent Millaudon.

The bill confirms Laurent Millaudon in his title to two certain tracts of land lying on the east side of Mobile bay, in Alabama, being the two tracts of land known as the De Feroit claims, as surveyed in 1830, and approved of by the surveyor general in 1835, with the exception of so much off of the north end thereof as has heretofore been surveyed and confirmed to William Patterson, and included within what is known as the Patterson claim, as now located: provided that the act shall only be construed as a relinquishment of any title that the United States may have to the lands; and that the confirmation shall inure to the benefit of any other persons, if such there be, as may be entitled to any part of the De Feroit claims under conveyances from him.

From the report it appears, that under the provisions of the act of 1812, authorizing the investigation of land titles south of the thirty-first degree and east of the Mississippi, an individual, without any authority for so doing, filed two alleged Spanish permits for lands on the east side of the Mobile bay, in favor of John B. Lorendine in the behalf of the Baron de Feroit. These claims were favorably reported upon by Commissioner Crawford, and communicated to the House of Representatives on the 5th day of January, 1816; in which report the said claims were numbered 90 and 91 of the third class. (American State Papers, Public Lands, vol. 3, page 11.) Subsequent to this report, but before Congress had any action thereon, one Arthur L. Simms became the purchaser of the right of De Feroit to the lands; and on the 3d of March, 1819, Congress passed an act confirming all the claims so favorably reported by the commissioner; and, under that act, the claims were regularly surveyed by the proper officers in 1830, and confirmed by the surveyor general in 1835, and are represented on the plats of the public surveys as the De Feroit claims, in township C south, of range two east, in the St. Stephen's district, Alabama. Subsequent to this, to wit: on the 20th of March, 1837, Laurent Millaudon, relying upon the representations made to him of the genuineness of those claims, and upon all the previous action of the officers of the Government and of Congress, by which they were declared to be good and valid titles, and as covering lands to which the Government had no claim, became the purchaser of certain portions of the same from Simms. Doubts having afterwards arisen as to the justice of these claims, with a view of securing the lands, pre-emption floats were laid thereon. Under the titles thus purchased by Mr. Millaudon, and believed by him to be most unimpeachable, he went on in making the most extensive preparations to establish a city upon those lands; and it appears to the committee, from the evidence adduced by him, that in this enterprise he has already actually expended upwards of one hundred thousand dollars. In March last, the question as to the validity of the De Feroit titles being brought before the General Land Office for consideration, that office required a report from the land officers at St. Stephens, upon all the facts and evidence in the case; and it satisfactorily appearing from that report and accompany documents that these claims of De Feroit were fraudulent in themselves, one purporting to be founded on a grant from Gayetano Perez, in 1800; when he was first in office, for twenty-two days, in December, 1803, as commandant ad interim, and was not in office as commandant of the post until 1809, and the other being only a permission for the temporary use of a tract of six or seven arpents on the Bayou Fra, or Froid, for a cowpen, for the security of cattle during an apprehended incursion of a band of Indians, the General Land Office decided that the De Feroit titles, being fraudulent, conveyed no title to the present holders under them.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN DICK.

An act (S. No. 70) for the relief of John Dick, of Florida.

The bill directs the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause a patent to be issued to John Dick for lots numbered ten, of section twenty-nine, and one, of section thirty-one, fractional section of thirty, and the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section thirty-two, all lying in township ten south, of range twenty-seven east, containing one hundred and fifty-three acres, situate in East Florida, and of the lands subject to sale at St. Augustine, Florida; provided that such patent shall only operate as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall not affect the rights of any third person.

It appears, from the report, that under the provisions of the act of Congress for the armed occupation and settlement of the unsettled part of the peninsula of East Florida, approved August 4, 1842, Mr. Dick filed his notice with the register of the land office at St. Augustine for a "permit" to settle upon one hundred and sixty acres of land south of the line dividing townships numbered nine and ten, and described as follows: Lot ten, section twenty-nine; lot one, in section thirty-one; fractional section thirty; and the northwest of the northwest quarter of section thirty-two; all of township ten, range twenty-seven south and east, containing in the aggregate one hundred and fifty-three thousand and twenty acres. On the 16th of April, 1843, the register of the land office issued "permit" No. 43, to Mr. Dick, giving him permission to settle upon the lands solicited, under the conditions of the said act; one of which was, "that no right or donation shall be acquired under this act within two miles of any permanent military post of the United States, established and garrisoned at the time such settlement and residence was commenced." This permit was canceled by the General Land Office, on the ground that the land embraced therein had been reserved in 1841 for military purposes. This shows that prior to his permit being canceled, he had complied with the requisitions of said military act, and also proves that his settlement was not within four miles of any military post established and garrisoned at the date of his settlement, or at any time subsequent thereto; that he was compelled to relinquish and abandon his settlement by virtue of such cancelation of his "permit;" and that since that period he has continued to reside south of the line specified in the said act of Congress, and has not received lands under the said act.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

ANNA M. E. RING, ETC.

An act (S. No. 185) for the relief of Anna M. E. Ring, Louisa M. Ring, Cordelia E. Ring, and Sarah J. De Lannoy.

The bill provides that the assignment by David A. Ring, to his four daughters, namely: Anna M. E. Ring, Cordelia E. Ring, Louisa M. Ring, and Sarah J. De Lannoy, of land warrant No. 3,172, for one hundred and sixty acres of land, issued on the 18th of July, 1855, to David A. Ring, shall be held to vest in the assignees all the right, title, and interests of David A. Ring in and to the warrant.

It appears, from the report, that on the 18th of July, 1855, a land warrant, No. 3,172, for one hundred and sixty acres of land, was issued to David A. Ring for military services during the war of 1812; that, prior to the receipt of said warrant, and while in a dying condition, he executed an assignment of his right to that warrant to his four daughters, namely: Anna M. E. Ring, Louisa M. Ring, Cordelia E. Ring, and Sarah J. De Lannoy. But the fourth section of an act entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved 23th September, 1850, declares all assignments made prior to the issue of a warrant to be null and void; and this assignment having been made prior to the issue of this warrant, the location was lawfully refused by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM B. TROTTER.

An act (S. No. 52) for the relief of William B. Trotter.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William B. Trotter, of Clarke county, Mississippi, $1,680, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same being in full of all his demands growing out of the emigration and subsistence of Choctaw Indians in Mississippi, in 1831, under a contract with the United States.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES G. BENTON AND OTHERS.

An act (S. No. 59) for the relief of James G. Benton, E. B. Babbitt, and James Longstreet, of the United States Army.

The bill directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, in settling the accounts of Lieutenant James G. Benton, of the ordnance department, of Brevet Major E. B. Babbitt, chief assistant quartermaster, and of Brevet Major James Longstreet, acting commissary of subsistence, to allow them, as credits, the respective amounts of which they were defrauded by Parker H. French, in San Antonio, Texas, in July, 1850; namely: to James G. Benton, $1,021 14; to E. B. Babbitt, $519 93; and to James Longstreet, $448 98.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

CHRISTINE BARNARD.

An act (S. No. 91) to continue a pension to Christine Barnard, widow of the late Brevet Major Moses J. Barnard, United States Army.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to continue upon the pension roll, at the rate of thirty dollars per month, from and after the 4th of July, 1857, when her pension expired, the name of Christine Barnard, widow of the late Brevet Major Moses J. Barnard, captain in company H, regiment of voligeurs, who was twice wounded in planting the American colors upon the parapet of Chepultepec while storming that fortress, and who died from disease contracted in, and greatly enhanced by hardships and fatigue of, the Mexican campaign; the pension to be held by her or by her children in accordance with existing laws in reference to the widows and children of those who died from wounds or disease received or contracted during the Mexican war.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

SUSANNA T. LEA.

An act (S. No. 96) for the relief of Susanna T. Lea, widow and administratrix of James Maglenen, late of the city of Baltimore, deceased.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the legal representatives of James Maglenen $130, being the value of a horse and equipments belonging to him, the same having been impressed in September, 1814, for the purpose of sending an express to North Point, and the horse and equipments having been lost in the service.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

DR. THOMAS ANTISELL.

A bill (H. R. No. 452) for the relief of Dr. Thomas Antisell.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Dr. Thomas Antisell, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $274 65, in full of the account of Antisell, for services rendered as acting assistant surgeon to the command (company G, third artillery) escorting Lieutenant Parke's party of survey from California to New Mexico in 1855.

From the report, it appears that Dr. Thomas Antisell, as geologist, accompanied Lieutenant John G. Parke, corps topographical engineers, in a survey and explorations for a Pacific railroad, made by said Parke in southern California, and along parallel 32° in the "Gadsden Purchase." During the progress of the expedition, the services of a medical attendant became necessary, and Dr. Antisell agreed to act, and did act in that capacity to the United States troops accompanying the party of survey. The agreement was made in the form of a regular contract entered into by Dr. Antisell, on the one part, and by Brevet Lieutenant George T. Andrews, commanding company G, on the part of the United States. The evidence submitted goes to prove that the services of Dr. Antisell, as medical attendant, were very valuable and were faithfully rendered.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT W. CUSHMAN.

A bill (H. R. No. 453) for the relief of Robert W. Cushman, formerly acting purser in the United States Navy.

The bill directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Robert

W. Cushman, acting purser of the "German-town," the flag-ship of the African squadron, the difference of pay between that of a purser and a captain's clerk, for such time as he so acted as purser.

The report states that on the 9th of January, 1851, the memorialist, Robert W. Cushman, was appointed secretary of the commander-in-chief of the African squadron, Commodore E. A. F. Lavallette. On the 21st of May following, owing to the feeble state of the health of Purser Christian, who was then detached, he was appointed by the commander-in-chief as acting purser, in the place and stead of Purser Christian so detached, and recognized as such by the Navy Department, as will appear from a letter from A. O. Dayton, Fourth Auditor, which is on file among the papers accompanying the petition. He continued to act in the capacity of purser until the 9th of December, 1851, and asks that he may be allowed for the time he so acted the difference of pay between that of secretary to the commander-in-chief and purser. Where a ship is not regularly entitled to a purser, it has not been the practice of the Department to allow, nor of this committee to report in favor of allowing, the difference of pay to captains' clerks appointed as pursers by other than the Department, and they are not recognized by or responsible to the Department when the captain of a ship or squadron is required to act as purser. This is not such a case; the German-town, the flag-ship of the squadron, was so entitled; and it appears to the committee that the recognition of Mr. Cushman as purser by the Department entitles him to the difference of pay for which he petitions.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN H. WHEELER.

A bill (H. R. No. 454) for the relief of John H. Wheeler, Esq., late United States Minister to Nicaragua. [Objected to by Mr. CURRY.]

MICHAEL PAPPRENIZA.

Joint resolution (No. 22) for the relief of Michael Pappreniza.

It authorizes the President to extend the provisions of the joint resolution, approved March 3, 1853, entitled "A resolution for the relief of the Spanish consul and other subjects of Spain residing at Key West, by indemnity for losses occasioned in 1851," to the case of one Michael Pappreniza, an Austrian subject, who, it is alleged, sustained losses at the same time, in consequence of his being supposed to be a Spaniard; provided that the amount allowed as indemnity to Pappreniza shall not exceed $200.

The report states that it appears from the letter of the Secretary of State, and the note of Chevalier Hülsemann, Minister Resident of Austria in the United States, that Michael Pappreniza, an Austrian subject, had been established for a number of years in New Orleans as a vender of fruit; that on the night of the 21st August, 1851, an attack was made upon his fruit stall in St. Mary's market, and his property destroyed by some riotous persons to the damage of $200, under the impression that he was a Spaniard, and had taken part with the Spanish Government in the Lopez expedition against Cuba. Congress, by a resolution approved 3d March, 1853, requested the President of the United States to cause an investigation as to any losses sustained by the consul of Spain, or other persons residing at New Orleans, or at Key West, in 1851, and who were at that time subjects of the Queen of Spain, by the violence of individuals, arising out of intelligence then recently received of the execution of certain persons at Havana, by the Spanish authorities at that island. The case of Pappreniza, being an Austrian subject, did not belong to those provided for by that resolution, and the committee see no good reason why he should not be indemnified as were the subjects of the Queen of Spain.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

MICAHAH BROOKS.

A bill (H. R. No. 455) for the relief of Micajah Brooks.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Micajah Brooks, of Georgia, on the pension roll, at the rate of four dollars per month, or forty-eight dollars per annum, and that he be paid at that rate from the 1st of January, 1850; and that that amount be paid to Micajah Brooks, if living; otherwise, to his surviving children.

The report states that the petitioner declares in his memorial, under the act of 7th June, 1832, that he served in the war of the Revolution, in the States of South Carolina and Georgia, as much as two years, as a private. He adduces as evidence record proof from the comptroller of the State of South Carolina, of three or four months' service, for which he has received land, say one hundred and sixty acres. He is regarded by a large number of witnesses where he resides as having served faithfully in the war of the Revolution. He is now near one hundred years of age, and in indigent circumstances; and the committee have thought it reasonable and just to report a bill for his relief, allowing him a pension at the rate of forty-eight dollars per annum, from the 1st of January, 1850, to be paid to the said Micajah Brooks, if living, and if deceased, to his surviving children.

Mr. LEITER. I move to strike out "four," and insert "eight," so as to provide a pension of eight dollars per month.

Mr. QUITMAN. I act upon principle, and cannot consent to pass a bill which will separate one individual from the community, and give him what others are not permitted to enjoy. This bill is framed upon the principles of revolutionary pensions, and therefore I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I shall object to the bill, if that amendment is made.

Mr. LEITER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to amend the bill by striking out the words "otherwise to his surviving children."

The bill provides that the amount shall be paid to the soldier, if living; and if not, to his surviving children. This is contrary to all our practice in giving revolutionary pensions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it be passed.

MAJOR JOHN JONES.

A bill (H. R. No. 456) granting an invalid pension to Brevet Major John Jones, of Tennessee.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Brevet Major John Jones, of Tennessee, on the invalid pension roll, and pay him a pension, at the rate of twenty-five dollars per month, from the 4th of September, 1856, and to continue during his natural life.

The report states that the memorialist entered the Army as a volunteer dragoon under General Jackson, in 1812, and was appointed by General Jackson, sword master. In 1813, January 13, he was appointed to the command of a company in the thirty-ninth regiment of infantry. With this regiment he joined General Jackson at the Ten Islands, on Coosa river, in January or February, 1814. He was honored with the command of the advance guard of the Army on the memorable 27th of March, following. "After descending the Alabama river, and whilst the regiment was encamped at Mount Vernon, he was sent overland, in disguise, by Colonel Benton, to ascertain its defenses, and the rate of the brig Hermes, then lying there." With the remains of the regiment he built Fort Montgomery, under the orders of Colonel Benton. In the latter part of 1816, the memorialist was sent with two companies to Attakapas, to give protection to the coast from the invasions of Lafitte, of notorious memory. He remained on the Teche until about April, 1817, when he was remanded to headquarters, Baton Rouge. Whilst on this duty he contracted a hepatic complaint, from which he has never recovered. The disease became so aggravated, that, in 1824, he was compelled to resign his commission in the Army, after having served ten years as a captain and been breveted a major. The memorialist having sacrificed his best prospects and the prime of his life for the good of his country, has nothing left but a broken constitution and the weight of seventy-seven years, with a fair prospect of becoming a mendicant.

Mr. BURNETT. I am acquainted with the merits of this case, and I want to make a statement to the committee, with a view to an amendment. [Cries of "Go on!"] This man is not a constituent of mine, as he lives in the State of Tennessee, but I know him. He is one of the most intelligent men I ever knew. He rendered as much service to the country as any man ever connected with the Army did. The testimony of Colonel Thomas H. Benton shows him to have been one of the most gallant and meritorious officers we have had. He was breveted as major of the Army. He lives in Tennessee, in a log-cabin, without any floor other than that furnished by the bare earth. He is also blind. This bill proposes to pay him twenty-five dollars a month as a pension.

Mr. CHAFFEE. That is all we could give him under the law.

Mr. BURNETT. The regular pay of a major of the Army is ninety dollars per month. Now, I ask this committee if they will not increase the pension of that old man of seventy-seven years? [Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"] I move to strike out "twenty-five dollars" and insert "forty dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass with an amendment.

KENNEDY O'BRIEN.

A bill (H. R. No. 457) for the relief of Kennedy O'Brien.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Kennedy O'Brien on the list of invalid pensioners at the rate of eight dollars per month, from the 1st of January, 1854.

The report states that the petitioner served in the late war with Mexico, having volunteered two different times; and that, while in the line of his duty, he contracted a chronic diarrhea, from the effects of which he became blind.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

EVELINA PORTER.

A bill (H. R. No. 458) for the relief of Evelina Porter, widow of the late Commodore David Porter, of the United States Navy.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Evelina Porter, widow of the late Commodore Porter, deceased, of the United States Navy, upon the list of invalid pensions, to be paid at the rate of thirty dollars per month, for five years, from the 9th of February, 1858; that if Evelina Porter shall intermarry before the expiration of the five years, then the pension shall cease at the date of her death.

Mr. BOCOCK. I do not wish to object to this bill, but I think there is a mistake in the last line. I move to strike out the words "her death" and insert in lieu thereof, the words "her said intermarriage."

The amendment was agreed to.

From the report the following facts appear: The memorialist states that her husband, David Porter, entered the United States Navy in 1798, as a midshipman; that in the Old Tripolitan war (1803) he received a wound, which, with the effects of a severe attack of yellow fever, contracted while in command of the United States squadron for the suppression of piracy in the West India seas, was the cause of his death; that believing the act of Congress of 30th of June, 1834, designed to confer its benefits on the widows of those who had faithfully served their country and who had died under the circumstances therein stated, she applied to the Commissioner of Pensions to be placed on the Navy pension roll; that officer decided that she was not entitled to the benefits of the act in question, because her husband at the time of his death was not an officer of the Navy. Under these circumstances she appeals to Congress, and prays the passage of an act for her benefit, granting her a pension, commencing at the date of her husband's death, in a similar manner and at the same rate with the widows of officers of her husband's rank who are now upon the Navy pension roll, whose husbands died before they left the naval service.

In support of her claim, Dr. Edmund L. Du Barre certifies that he was attached to the squadron commanded by Commodore David Porter in the West Indies, for the suppression of piracy; that Porter contracted in 1823 a violent attack of yellow fever; his life was despaired of; his system was totally unable to react; he had received many severe wounds in the service; the yellow fever reopened old wounds, and his left cavish, which had been wounded many years before, suppurated, and pieces of bone exfoliated; saw him again in 1824-25; his health was then precarious; his stomach, liver, and bowels were very much deranged; having lived in the cabin of the "Sea Gull" with him, had ample opportunity of observing the condition of his system; was a constant witness to his intense sufferings; saw him again in 1838 or 1839; saw the breaking up of his physical powers rapidly advancing. The account of his death is consistent with his view of the case from the beginning. The wound on the scrotum, deranging the urinary organs and obstructing the functions of the bladder, of itself was serious; but attended with an almost total paralysis of the action of the parts, death was a most certain result. That his death is wholly attributable to wounds received and disease contracted in the service, in the actual performance of his duties, he has not the slightest doubt.

G. H. Heap certifies that he resided with Commodore David Porter for nine months previous to his death, in constant attendance upon him during his last illness up to his death, on the 3d of March, 1843. His death was caused in a great measure by a disorder of the bladder from a wound produced by a ball, which injured the relative parts. During his last illness it was often necessary to lift him out of bed twenty times a night, and to use the catheter before relieved. Has no doubt his death was caused by wounds and sickness received in his country's service by the obstruction of the urethra by the wound, aggravated by other injuries, and especially the attack of yellow fever above referred to.

George A. Porter certifies that he was a nephew of Commodore David Porter; was with him from 1830 to the day of his death, March 3, 1843; resided with him the whole time he lived at Constantinople; attended him during his illness, and was present when he died. His premature death was attributed, by all who were intimately acquainted with him, to the zealous discharge of his duties in the naval service.

C. W. Goldsborough, secretary of the Navy commissioners, states that Commodore Porter has rendered not only long and faithful, but extraordinary services, as the records of the Navy Department will fully testify. In February, 1798, he was a midshipman on board the frigate Constellation; in 1800 was promoted to first lieutenant of the Experiment. That in an engagement off Old Tripoli, by a detachment of the vessels of the squadron under command of Commodore R. V. Morris, at that time commanded by Lieutenant Porter, as the boats approached, several of our men were killed and wounded, among the latter Lieutenant Porter, who received a slight wound in the right thigh and a ball through the left. Commodore Morris reported Lieutenant David Porter and others as deserving particular distinction on that occasion.

John Downes, a captain in the United States Navy, states that in 1799 or 1800 he was a boy on the frigate Constellation, in the West Indies, when Commodore Porter, then quite a youth, commanded a small schooner, pursued an enemy's vessel of superior force into shoal water, and captured her after a sharp action. He witnessed his gallant attack on the enemy's vessels with a detachment of boats under his command from the United States squadron at Old Tripoli in 1803. In this attack he was wounded through the thigh; all the enemy's vessels were set on fire. Commodore Porter was in several actions in the West Indies during our war with France in 1799 and 1800, and in one of them was wounded in the shoulder; has known him intimately since 1802; was his first lieutenant on the Essex, during the whole time he commanded her; does not believe any country can boast of his superior as a naval commander; no man has done more to build up the reputation of the Navy.

F. A. Thornton says, that in December, 1822, he was purser of the piratical expedition for the West Indies, under Commodore David Porter; continued with him till his return, in the fall or winter of 1824 or 1825. While in this service, Porter suffered from severe attacks of yellow fever, &c.

Joshua Blake, a captain in the Navy, says he was second lieutenant of the schooner Experiment, then in command of Lieutenant Maley; that Commodore David Porter was then first lieutenant of the schooner. On the 1st of January, 1800, they had an engagement of some hours with several brigand barges. During the action, which part of the time was close and severe, Commodore (then Lieutenant) Porter received a wound in the left shoulder. He distinctly recollects that he suffered much from the effect of the contusion.

Memorialist's marriage with David Porter is proven by the statements of Rebecca S. Connell and Mary Davenport, who were present at their marriage, which, together with her own statement, under oath, fixes the date of their marriage on the 9th day of March, 1808, at the residence of her father, in the town of Chester, Pennsylvania.

From the testimony it appears that Commodore David Porter's death is wholly attributable to wounds and injuries received, and disease contracted by him, while in his country's service, and in the discharge of his duties; that his death occurred at Constantinople, in Turkey, on the 3d of March, 1843, at which place he was at the time a diplomatic functionary of the Government, and not in the naval service of the United States.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

SILAS STEVENS.

A bill (H. R. No. 459) granting an invalid pension to Silas Stevens, of Virginia.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Silas Stevens, of Virginia, on the invalid pension roll, and pay him a pension, at the rate of four dollars a month, from the 1st of February, 1858, during his natural life.

It appears from the report that the memorialist entered the service about the 1st of September, 1812, in the company of Captain James Morgan, in Colonel Dudley Evans's regiment of Virginia militia, and that he was marched to the Northwest to join General Harrison; that at a small village, called Delaware, in the State of Ohio, he was taken sick, where he remained six weeks, not being able to perform duty as a soldier, and there being no prospect that he ever would be, he was discharged, and left to get home as best he could.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

BERIAH WRIGHT.

A bill (H. R. No. 460) granting an invalid pension to Beriah Wright, of New York.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Beriah Wright, of New York, upon the roll of invalid pensioners of the United States, and to pay him a pension, at the rate of four dollars per month, from the 16th day of February, 1858, during his natural life.

The report shows that the memorialist was in the service of the United States Army as a corporal, and that owing to exposure from want of tents and clothing, he was attacked with rheumatism so severely that Major Bayly, commanding the regiment, allowed him to procure a substitute and return to his home, some four or five weeks before the expiration of his term of service. The term of service commenced May 19, 1813, and Corporal Wright left in the winter of 1813-14 to go home. Dr. Kenrick testifies that Wright left home in good health, robust and vigorous, and returned for medical advice; his complaint was rheumatism; and that it has disabled him, the said Wright, one half or three quarters.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

JOHN LEE.

A bill (H. R. No. 461) granting an invalid pension to John Lee, of the State of Maine.

The bill directs that the name of John Lee be placed upon the pension list of the United States, at the rate of eight dollars per month, from the 22d of December, 1857, and that the Secretary of the Interior pay him eight dollars per month, to be estimated and computed from and after December 22, 1857, and to continue during life.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions report that Lee, under the name of John Richards, a private, enlisted into the service for the war on the 3d of February, 1813, in the ninth regiment of United States infantry, and has been traced on the rolls of his company up to the 15th of May, 1815. He fought in five pitched battles: battle of Williamsburg, in said regiment, in General Covington's brigade; at Fort Erie; at Chippewa, Queenstown, and Fort George; at Bridgewater, or Lundy's Lane; the siege of Fort Erie, which lasted fifty or sixty days; and was in the fight when Fort Erie was blown up, and at the sortie near said fort when the enemy's batteries were taken and blown up by the American forces. It further appears that in said ninth regiment, at the battle of Lundy's Lane, that all of said Lee's company, with the exception of himself and one other private, were either killed, wounded, or left the field before the termination of said battle. From the proof it further appears that at said battle, and in the night time, he was hit by a musket ball in the left shoulder and badly injured; that in consequence of said injury his left arm and hand have become almost disabled.

Mr. QUITMAN. I move to amend the bill by striking out "eight dollars" and inserting "four dollars," so as to make it conform to the pension laws.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House.

JAMES FUGATE.

A bill (H. R. No. 462) granting an invalid pension to James Fugate, of Missouri.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of James Fugate, of Missouri, upon the roll of invalid pensioners, and pay him a pension, at the rate of eight dollars per month, instead of four dollars per month, the amount he now receives; to commence on the 4th of March, 1858, and to continue during his natural life.

It appears, from the papers submitted, that James Fugate was placed on the invalid pension roll, by a special act of Congress, at the rate of four dollars per month. By the certificate of George Johnson, surgeon United States marine hospital at St. Louis, Missouri, it is shown that said James Fugate is wholly disabled.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

ELMIRA WHITE.

A bill (H. R. No. 463) for the relief of Elmira White, widow of Captain Thomas R. White.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Elmira White, widow of Thomas R. White, of Maine, on the pension roll, from the date of the disease and disability contracted by him in the service of his country, during her widowhood, at the same rate per annum, and in lieu of the pension received by her.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That bill contains an entirely new principle. I have no objection to the bill if it is made to conform to the law which gives to the widow of the soldier who had died in the service, or of disease contracted in the service, a pension for five years and subsequently for another five years. But this bill proposes to go back to the date of the disease in 1812 or 1813 and give her this pension for forty or fifty years.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to amend the bill, so as to make the pension commence from the date of the passage of the bill.

Mr. GROW. As I understand it, this widow is drawing a pension now. If we strike out the pension she now receives, and put in five years' pension, will it not reduce her pension?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. It will just give her a pension for five years.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is she now getting a pension?

Mr. CHAFFEE. Half pay.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is it continuous?

Mr. CHAFFEE. It is.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I object to the bill.

MICHAEL KINNY.

An act (S. No. 35) for the relief of Michael Kinny, late a private in company I, eighth regiment United States Army.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Michael Kinny on the pension list, at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing on the 11th of December, 1856, and to continue during his life.

Mr. QUITMAN. I move to amend the bill by striking out "eight," and inserting "four."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then I object to the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not know anything about this case, but I understand from the report that this man has had one of his legs amputated, and that is always held at the Pension Office to be a total disability.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Well, lex non curat minimis. I withdraw the objection.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

CORNELIUS H. LATHAM.

A bill (H. R. No. 464) for the relief of Cornelius H. Latham.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to allow and pay Cornelius H. Latham, of New York, an invalid pensioner, eight dollars per month during his natural life, in lieu of the pension now allowed him by law, to commence on the 25th of February, 1856.

It appears that the petitioner was, by special act of Congress for his relief, approved July 17, 1854, placed on the pension list, at the rate of four dollars per month, on account of disease contracted while in the line of his duty, in the service of the United States, as a private in Captain E. V. Sumner's company of United States dragoons. The petitioner now states that the said disease has continued to this time, and renders him unable to perform any labor. He presents the affidavits of two physicians, who are certified to be reputable in their profession, who state that he is not only still disabled, but, in consequence, is disabled to a degree amounting to a total disability.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

EDWARD N. KENT.

A bill (H. R. No. 465) for the relief of Edward N. Kent. [Objected to by Mr. UNDERWOOD.]

ADVERSE REPORTS FROM COURT OF CLAIMS.

The following adverse reports from the Court of Claims stood next in order upon the Calendar: An adverse report (No. 159) upon the petition of Joseph Ratcliff;

An adverse report (No. 160) upon the petition of Oliver Dubois;

An adverse report (No. 162) upon the petition of Arthur Edwards and others;

An adverse report (No. 164) upon the petition of A. O. P. Nicholson; and

An adverse report (No. 166) upon the petition of Joshua J. Guppy, judge of the county court of Columbia county, Wisconsin, as trustee for the claimants and occupants of "Portage City."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope that these adverse reports will be reported to the House, with a recommendation that they be concurred in.

Mr. WALDRON. I desire that report No. 162 be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

It was so ordered.

The other reports were then laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that they be concurred in.

JAMES RUMPH.

A bill (H. R. No. 476) for the relief of James Rumph.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to James Rumph, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $760, it being in full compensation for medical aid rendered to soldiers in the service of the United States in 1837.

The report having been read, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

WILLIAM TURVIN.

A bill (C. C. No. 81) for the relief of the heirs of William Turvin, deceased.

The bill authorizes the heirs of William Turvin, deceased, to locate, free of cost, nine hundred and sixty arpents of land, or as near thereto as the same can be done, not exceeding that quantity, according to the legal subdivisions, on any of the public lands of the United States subject to entry at private sale; which lands, when so located, shall be in full for the claim of their father, William Turvin, to a tract of land lying on the east side of the Mobile river and west of the Bayou Pascual, under a grant from the Spanish Government, and which was recommended for confirmation on the report of the register and receiver of the land office for the district of St. Stephens; and authorizes the Commissioner of the General Land Office, upon the receipt of the certificate of entry from the proper land office, to issue a patent for the land so located.

The report states that, on the 30th June, 1787, Samuel Moore, an inhabitant of the jurisdiction of Mobile, petitioned the Governor of Florida for a concession of twelve arpents of land situated and lying on the Tensaw, or east branch of the Mobile river, contiguous to Bayou Pascual, and the lands of one Strahan, certified to be vacant by Don Vincente Falch, captain of the Louisiana regiment of infantry, civil and military commandant of the town of Mobile, and of the district thereto appertaining. On the 3d August following, the concession was granted by the Governor, Don Stephen Miro, with an order of settlement and survey, directing Don Charles Laveau Tudeau, surveyor general of the province, to "put the petitioner in possession of twelve arpents front by the ordinary depth of forty," making an area of four hundred and eighty arpents. So far as the proof in the case discloses, there never was any survey made, and nothing further done by the Spanish authorities towards perfecting the title. But it is well established that Moore shortly afterwards took possession of the land, erected buildings thereon, made "considerable improvements, with roads leading to and from," &c., and continued to occupy it until his death, which must have occurred shortly thereafter, for on the 7th November, 1791, his widow, who appears in the mean time to have married a man by the name of Thompson, assumed to convey the land to William Turvin, the ancestor of the present claimants.

Afterwards, on the 20th August, 1806, Turvin applied to Morales, the Intendant General of the Floridas, for an additional concession of twelve arpents, with the ordinary depth of forty, contiguous to the first tract; the application was referred to Armand de Courville, Minister of the Royal Revenue, who reported on the 19th of September, 1806, in favor of the concession; there appears no further assurance of title from the Spanish Government; the proof shows that Turvin continued to occupy and improve the lands until his death in 1810, and his children from that time until, under the act of the 11th February, 1813, the territory was transferred to the jurisdiction of the United States, and, indeed, for many years afterwards. It appears that on the 19th June, 1813, one James Conway, as executor of William Turvin, and as agent for his heir, gave notice to William Crawford, commissioner of land claims east of Pearl river, that he claimed this land embraced in the original concession to Samuel Moore, but seems to have produced no evidence that it had ever been inhabited or cultivated; and for this omission, the commission did not admit the validity of the claim.

By a letter under date of October 13, 1857, addressed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to Hon. Philip Phillips, it appears "that all the southern part of township one south, of range two east, lying east of the Tensaw river, for more than three miles from the southern boundary of said township, and the north part of township two south, of range two east, and lying east of the Tensaw river for a distance of more than two miles from the northern boundary of said township, except the east part of section eleven and all of section twelve, which are in the eastern part of said township, and distant from Tensaw river, but are one mile from the northern boundary of said township, are covered by the private claims of Joshua Kennedy, J. L. Seabury, the heirs of Robert Wolfington, the representatives of William Fisher, John and Bruner Griffin, the heirs of Robert Gilchrist, and Aaron Barlow and wife;" from which it will be seen that these private claims cover all the land described in the report of the register and receiver as nine hundred and sixty arpents, situate and lying in township one and two south, of range two east, on the east bank of the Mobile river, and the east branch of the same, usually called the Tensaw river, and bounded by the Bayou Pascual and the land claimed by Strahan.

From this it would seem that the Government has sold and received pay for the lands. By testimony taken, it appears altogether probable that other persons are, and for many years have been, in the possession of these lands, under adverse paramount titles; or, at any rate, that the heirs of Turvin have not been in possession of any portion thereof for the last twenty-five or thirty years. How they lost their possession, whether by sale or voluntary abandonment, or a legal eviction, does not appear.

The Committee of Claims report that an amendment be offered to the bill permitting the lands to be located on lands subject to private entry at $1.25 per acre.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

DR. FERDINAND O. MILLER.

A bill (H. R. No. 480) for the relief of Ferdinand O. Miller.

The bill authorizes and requires the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to audit and settle the account of Dr. Ferdinand O. Miller, and allow him the pay of an assistant surgeon in the Army from July 6, 1846, to February 28, 1847, both days inclusive, in full for his services as surgeon and assistant surgeon during the late war with Mexico, deducting therefrom the amount paid Dr. Miller as a private soldier during the same specified time.

The evidence shows that Doctor Miller engaged as a private soldier in the service of the United States during the war with Mexico, but was afterwards detailed by the colonel of his regiment to discharge the duties of surgeon and assistant surgeon, which he did discharge from the 6th day of July, 1846, to the 28th day of February, following, both days inclusive. The proof shows that this service was absolutely necessary to be performed by some surgeon to be appointed at the time, owing to the sickness and absence of the assistant surgeon, and, for a time, the necessary absence of the surgeon of the regiment.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

DINAH MINIS.

A bill (H. R. No. 481) for the relief of Dinah Minis.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Dinah Minis, or her legal representatives, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sums due on loan-office certificates—No. 93, for $37 27½; No. 94, for $74 55½; and No. 104, for $81 66; all dated August 19, 1791, and signed by Richard Wylly, commissioner of loans—on the surrender of the original certificates at the Treasury Department.

The petitioner predicates her claim upon the three following certificates, to wit:

UNITED STATES LOAN OFFICE,
STATE OF GEORGIA, August 19, 1791.
Be it known, that there is due from the United States of America, unto Mr. George Whitefield, of the State of South Carolina, or his assigns, the sum of $37 27½ bearing interest at six per cent. per annum from the 1st day of January, 1801, inclusively, payable quarter yearly, and subject to redemption by payments not exceeding in one year, on account of both principal and interest, the proportion of eight dollars upon a hundred of the stock bearing interest at six per cent., created by virtue of an act making provision for the debt of the United States, passed on the 4th day of August, 1790, which debt is recorded in this office, and is transferable only by appearance in person or by attorney at the proper office, according to the rules and forms instituted for that purpose.

RICH'D WYLLY,
Commissioner of Loans.

No. 94.] UNITED STATES LOAN OFFICE,
STATE OF GEORGIA, August 19, 1791.

Be it known, that there is due from the United States of America unto Mr. George Whitefield, of the State of South Carolina, or his assigns, the sum of $74 55½, bearing interest at six per cent. per annum from the 1st day of January, 1791, inclusively, payable quarter yearly, and subject to redemption by payments not exceeding in one year, on account both of principal and interest, the proportion of eight dollars upon a hundred of the stock bearing interest at six per cent., created by virtue of an act making provision for the debt of the United States, passed on the 4th day of August, 1790, which debt is recorded in this office, and is transferable only by appearance in person or by attorney, at the proper office, according to the rules and forms instituted for that purpose.

RICH'D WYLLY,
Commissioner of Loans.

No. 104.] UNITED STATES LOAN OFFICE,
STATE OF GEORGIA, August 19, 1791.

Be it known, that there is due from the United States of America unto Mr. George Whitefield, of the State of South Carolina, or his assigns, the sum of $81 66, bearing interest at three per cent. per annum, from the 1st day of January, 1791, inclusively, payable quarter yearly, and subject to redemption by the payment of said sum, whenever provision shall be made therefor by law, which debt is recorded in this office, and is transferable only by appearance in person, or by attorney, at the proper office, according to the rules and forms instituted for that purpose.

RICH'D WYLLY,
Commissioner of Loans.

Letters on file from the Registers of the Treasury show that these several certificates constitute valid claims against the United States in favor of George Whitefield, or his legal representatives or attorney.

It is alleged that Isaac Minis is now dead, and that the petitioner is his widow; it might be enough to place her claim upon the blank indorsement appearing upon the certificates, by analogy to the rules governing commercial paper. But this is strengthened to such a degree by the other facts in the case as to leave scarcely a doubt that the certificates are just and in good faith the property of the petitioner, although their form is such that, by the rules of the Treasury Department, the amounts due upon them cannot be paid to her.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALONZO AND ELBRIDGE G. COLBY.

A bill (H. R. No. 486) for the relief of Alonzo and Elbridge G. Colby.

The bill appropriates $2,502 11 to Alonzo Colby and Elbridge G. Colby, of Buckport, in Maine, that sum being the balance due them on their contract with the United States, dated July 24, 1855, for constructing a breakwater at Owl's Head harbor, Penobscot river, Maine.

The report states that the justice of the claim is fully established by letters transmitted from the War Department.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

LAND OFFICE CLERKS IN OREGON.

A bill (H. R. No. 169) making an appropriation for the payment of clerks employed in the offices of the registers of the land offices at Oregon City and Winchester, in the Territory of Oregon.

The bill appropriates $7,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to reimburse the registers of the land offices at Oregon City and Winchester, in the Territory of Oregon, for expenses incurred by them in the employment of clerks actually required for the transaction of the business of their respective offices, growing out of an act entitled "An act to create the office of surveyor general of the public lands in Oregon, and to provide for the survey and to make donations to settlers of the said public lands," approved September 27, 1850.

The report states that by the act of Congress of 27th of September, 1850, "establishing the office of surveyor general of the Territory of Oregon, and for other purposes," donations of land were offered to persons then residing in Oregon, or who might emigrate thereto within a certain period, being citizens of the United States, or having filed their declarations to become citizens, upon condition of occupying for four years and making certain improvements, with one half of the land to their wives, if they were married, and survivorship to their children, in case of death. Under this act the duties growing out of the making entries of locations and proving up claims were devolved on the surveyor general. By the act of 17th of July, 1854, the preemption act of September 4, 1841, was extended to the Territory of Oregon. By the same act land offices were established, and registers and receivers appointed in said Territory. This act devolved on these officers the duties prescribed for such officers in other land districts, including the duties before assigned to the surveyor general, growing out of donation claims. It fixed their compensation at $2,500 each, with office rent, and expressly prohibited their receiving fees or any other emoluments.

In other land districts, registers and receivers are compensated in part by salary and in part by commission on the amount of sales of public lands, limited to a maximum of $3,000 per annum. They are also allowed fees for entries made on bounty land warrants. Clerk hire is allowed to some extent, and the commissions and fees furnish a sum, perhaps, sufficient for such additional services of that kind as may be required. In the case of the land officers of Oregon, there is no fund of either kind; and yet the clerical duties arising under the donation and preemption acts formed a very important branch of the business of the officers from the time of their appointment. Since the year 1854, the term of occupation required by the donation act expired in a vast number of cases, and it was every way desirable and important to the United States, to the Territory, and to the settlers, that they should be able to make their proofs, obtain their certificates, and otherwise perfect their titles. To accomplish these objects without delay, and prevent the business of the office from falling into arrears and disorder, clerical aid was absolutely indispensable. The registers were therefore compelled to employ clerical aid, relying upon the justice of Congress, upon full view of the facts, to reimburse the expense thus incurred. The Commissioner of the General Land Office estimates the sum required at $6,405, but suggests, by way of precaution, that the sum of $7,000 be appropriated.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

ISAAC BODY AND SAMUEL FLEMING.

A bill (H. R. No. 490) for the relief of Isaac Body and Samuel Fleming.

The bill allows Isaac Body to enter, at the land office at Springfield, Illinois, at the minimum price, at any time within one year after the date of this act, the southeast quarter of section nineteen of township twenty-six north, of range twelve west; and that Samuel Fleming be allowed to enter, at the same land office, and on the same terms and conditions, the northwest quarter of section twenty, township twenty-six north, range twelve west; provided, however, that this act shall only operate as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States.

The petitions and affidavits presented in this case establish the following facts: Isaac Body and Samuel Fleming, about the year 1842, settled, each for himself, upon certain quarter sections of land in Illinois; that they have continued to reside, and have made considerable improvements, thereon up to the present time; that the lands so settled upon by them were selected by Illinois, under the act of Congress approved September 4, 1841; but for some reason such selections were not approved by the General Land Office, and were rejected; that such rejection, although notified to the State, were not notified to the local land office, and in consequence Body and Fleming have been, and still are, unable to procure titles to their farms, either from the United States or Illinois. It appears that they have often applied, at both the United States and State land offices, to pay their moneys and procure titles; but each disclaiming the right to sell them, have failed to attain their object, and now ask Congress for relief.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT H. MORRIS.

A bill (H. R. No. 491) for the relief of the legal representatives of Robert H. Morris, late postmaster of the city of New York. [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.]

HENRY ORNDORF.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 24) for the relief of Henry Orndorf.

The resolution authorizes and instructs the Postmaster General to revise and readjust the account of the Department with Henry Orndorf, for mail service on route No. 9157, from Zanesville to Columbus, Ohio, and to allow him full pay for the service, the same as if his bid had been for service six times a week, as required by the advertisement, instead of daily service.

From the report it appears that George Manville contracted to carry the United States mail from Zanesville to Columbus, Ohio, (being route No. 9157,) daily, from July 1, 1856, to June 30, 1860. The mail was carried six times a week, and a deduction was made by the Department for deficiency of service, the Department insisting that the word daily, in the contract, required service seven days each week. The contractor, on the other hand, alleged that Sunday service was not wanted, and that his intention, when he made his bid, was for service six times a week. The Department did not allege that Sunday service was wanted on the route, but as the contract calls for daily service, the Department had no alternative but to make the proportional deduction from the pay. In May, 1857, George Manville transferred his contract to Henry Orndorf, to take effect from April 1, 1857. The Department continued to deduct $53 30 per quarter from the pay for the failure of the Sunday trip, the whole pay as per contract being $1,495 a year. Mr. Orndorf remonstrated with the Department. He asserted that it was not the intention, when the bid was made, to run more than six times a week, and that the postmasters on the route would neither receive nor deliver the mail on Sunday. Mr. Orndorf, failing to convince the Post Office Department, applies to Congress. It appears from the papers before the committee that the advertisement issued by the Department was for mail service upon route No. 9157, three times a week and six times a week, and that the bidder used the term daily, as per the advertisement of the Department. This shows, to the satisfaction of your committee, that the bidder supposed he was bidding for daily service during the business portion of the week. To corroborate this view of the case, there are among the papers the affidavits of those conversant with the facts, that such was the understanding of the bidder when his bid was made out. It also appears from the papers in the case that it had not been customary to have Sunday service on the route, and that neither the interests of the Department nor the public required it.

The resolution was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN DEARMIT.

A bill (H. R. No. 492) for the relief of John Dearnit.

The bill authorizes and directs the Postmaster General to pay to John Dearnit $295, in addition to the amount already paid him by the Government under his contract for carrying the mail upon the route No. 1601 from July 1, 1844, for four years.

The report states that the committee are satisfied the petitioner made the mistake in his petition alleged; that upon discovering his mistake, and before he was notified by the Department of the acceptance of his bid, he gave the Department notice of his mistake, and requested to be discharged from the performance of his bid; that this the Department declined for want of power to do so; and under advice he entered into and performed his contract for the time required, four years. His bid was for the rate of $93 per year, next lowest bid at the rate of $166 75. They recommend allowing petitioner a difference between his bid and next lowest bid, being at the rate of $73 75 per year, and amounting for the four years he carried the mail to $295.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

STUCKEY AND ROGERS.

A bill (H. R. No. 493) for the relief of Stuckey and Rogers.

The bill authorizes and directs the Postmaster General to pay to Stuckey & Rogers, mail contractors on the route No. 6078, from Winsboro' to Pinckneyville, in South Carolina, at the rate of $333 per annum, for the transportation of the mails on said route; deducting therefrom whatever payments may have been made, at the rate of $138 per annum, by the Post Office Department.

It appears from the petition of Stuckey & Rogers, and from the letter of the Postmaster General, dated the 15th March, 1856, that these parties intended to bid, and did bid, for carrying the mail weekly on route No. 6082, which runs from Chester Court-house to Pinckneyville, South Carolina, at the rate of $138 per annum, the distance being twenty-two miles. In filling up the bid they incautiously inserted from Winsboro' to Pinckneyville. This mail route is known as No. 6078, and is seventy-two miles in length. The Department, it seems, presumed that Messrs. Stuckey & Rogers meant to bid for route No. 6078, because the bid specified from Winsboro', although route No. 6082 was as distinctly specified. It appears that these parties have carried the mail on route No. 6078, from Winsboro' to Pinckneyville, seventy-two miles, for $138; and it also appears that the actual lowest bid for said route was at the rate of $333 per annum; and, although the contractors might be justly entitled at the rate of $138 for twenty-two miles, which would give them $451 64; yet, considering that they had inadvertently inserted Winsboro' instead of Chester Court-house, although the number of the route and the number of miles was correct, and considering that the lowest bid which the Department received was at the rate of $333 per annum, the committee is of opinion that the petitioners should be compensated at the rate of $333 per annum, instead of $138 per annum, as proposed by the Department.

WILLIAM DOTY AND OTHERS.

A bill (H. R. No. 494) for the relief of William Doty and others.

The bill appropriates $600 to defray the expenses and indemnify William Doty and others, citizens of Missouri, incurred in arresting and bringing to trial Joseph Clark and — Baker, charged with robbing the United States mail; and directs that the sum be paid out, on the order of the Postmaster General, to such persons as, in his judgment, upon hearing all the proofs in the case, shall be entitled to the same, and in such proportion as he shall direct.

The bill was laid aside; to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

KIMBALL AND MOORE, MOORE AND WALKER.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 25) authorizing the Postmaster General to revise and adjust the accounts of Kimball & Moore and Moore & Walker.

The joint resolution directs the Postmaster General to revise and adjust the fines and deductions imposed upon Kimball & Moore and Moore & Walker, late contractors on thirteen mail routes, designated by the following numbers, to wit: Routes Nos. 8800, 8801, 8813, 8814, 8815, 8827, 8871, 8872, 8907, 8909, 8910, and to settle the same upon principles of justice and equity; provided that the fines and deductions shall not be reduced below the pro rata pay of the contract.

From the evidence submitted, it appears that the contractors were subjected to various fines for failures in the performance of their duty. That these failures were occasioned by causes entirely beyond the control of the contractors, such as deep snows, the washing away of bridges by freshets, high water at creek crossings, and difficulties at various ferries, but more particularly in consequence of frequent failures on the part of railroad companies, from whom these contractors received their mails, to deliver them in proper time.

The joint resolution was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

HEIRS OF HENRY KING.

A bill (H. R. No. 496) for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry King, deceased.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the legal representatives of Henry King the sum of $1,817 36, it being for his services in the third Maryland regiment, and in the commissary department, during the revolutionary war.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

S. W. AND A. A. TURNER.

A bill (H. R. No. 502) for the relief of Samuel W. and Alvin A. Turner.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $23,825, to Samuel W. Turner, and Alvin A. Turner, in full for their services in transporting the United States mail on their steamers from Cleveland, Ohio, and Detroit, Michigan, to Mackinaw, Sault Ste. Marie, Marquette, Copper Harbor, Eagle Harbor, Eagle river, and Ontonagon, Michigan, and La Pointe, Bayfield, and Superior City, in Wisconsin.

It appears from the report that this claim is for compensation for transportation of the United States mails, in steamboats, between Cleveland, Ohio, and Detroit, Michigan, and the several post offices on Lake Huron and Lake Superior, during the years from 1851 to 1857, both inclusive, from Detroit to Sault Ste. Marie, five hundred miles and back, summer of 1851, twenty-seven trips; from Detroit to Sault Ste. Marie, five hundred miles and back, summer of 1852, twenty-five trips; from Detroit to Sault Ste. Marie, five hundred miles and back, summer of 1853, twenty-nine trips; from Detroit to Sault Ste. Marie, five hundred miles and back, summer of 1854, twenty-six trips; from Cleveland to Sault Ste. Marie, 1854, nine trips; from Cleveland to La Pointe, eleven hundred miles, 1855, thirty-four trips; from Cleveland to La Pointe, eleven hundred miles, 1856, fifteen trips—making one hundred and sixty-five trips, for which $125 per round trip is charged, amounting to $20,265; and from Cleveland to Superior City, about twelve hundred miles and back, during the summer of 1857, sixteen trips, at $200 per trip, $3,200—making a total of $23,825. It appears from a statement furnished by the Post Office Department that prior to 1852 there was no contract in existence for the service on Lake Superior; but in June of that year the postmaster of Sault Ste. Marie was authorized to engage steamboat service between his office and Ontonagon, including the supply of intermediate offices, at fifteen dollars per trip. Under this arrangement the claimants appear to have received $1,410, and for this special service no further charge is made, and that item is not included in this claim. In May, 1856, the claimants were offered fifty dollars per trip to carry the mail between Cleveland and Ontonagon three times a week. They claim to have performed fifteen trips during that season, but have received no pay. They claim $125 per trip, which the Department declines to admit. It does not appear from the statement of the Department that any portion of the service for which compensation is now claimed has been paid for, and the committee are entirely satisfied that such payment has never been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection. The bill will be laid aside, to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I have an amendment to offer to that bill.

Several MEMBERS. The gentleman is too late. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman was too late. The bill has passed from the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I got up as soon as I possibly could after the Clerk had finished the reading of the report of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I object to the bill, then. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's objection comes too late.

JOB STAFFORD.

A bill (H. R. No. 503) for the relief of Job Stafford, of the State of New York.

The bill directs the Commissioner of Pensions to issue to Job Stafford, of New York, a bounty land warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land, the same to be held, located, or assigned, as if it had issued in the ordinary way, on application under existing laws.

It appears from the report that from 1823 to 1833, Job Stafford received six dollars per month, and from 1833 to this time he has been receiving eight dollars per month, as a pension on account of the fracture of one of his legs by a ball from the English gun-boats in Galliard creek, near the mouth of Bosquet river, on the 13th of May, 1814. He applied for bounty land under the act of 1855; the third section of which declares "that in no case shall any such certificate or warrant be issued for any service less than fourteen days, except when the person shall actually have been engaged in battle." It further appears that Stafford volunteered on the 12th of May, went into this fight on the next day, and was wounded, and for six months thereafter confined to his house in consequence of the wound, not entering the service again. The Pension Office rejected his application for bounty land; first, because he did not serve fourteen days; and, secondly, because, in the opinion of the Commissioner, the affair at the Bosquet, on Lake Champlain, was a mere skirmish, which could not be dignified with the name of "battle," so as to bring the applicant within the terms of the law.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH M'BRIER.

A bill (H. R. No. 504) for the relief of Elizabeth McBrier, surviving child and heir of Colonel Archibald Loughrey, deceased.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to issue land scrip in eighty-acre certificates, receivable in payment for publiclands at any of the land offices in the United States, in favor of Elizabeth McBrier, only surviving child and heir of Colonel Archibald Loughrey, deceased, or to her order, for an amount equal to six thousand six hundred and sixty-six acres and two thirds of an acre of land which may be located on land subject to private entry, at $1 25 per acre, or less.

It appears from the report that the Commonwealth of Virginia, on the 2d of January, 1781, yielded to the Congress of the United States, for the benefit of the States, all right, title, and claim which the Commonwealth had to the territory northwest of the river Ohio, subject to the conditions annexed to the act of cession; which act of cession, with the conditions annexed, the Congress of the United States accepted, among which conditions was the following: "That a quantity, not exceeding one hundred and fifty thousand acres, of land, promised by the State of Virginia, should be allowed and granted to the then Colonel (now General) George Rogers Clark, and to the officers and soldiers of his regiment who marched with him when the posts of Kaskaskias and St. Vincent were reduced, and to the officers and soldiers that have since been incorporated into the said regiment; to be laid off in one tract, the length of which not to exceed double the breadth, in such place on the northwest side of the Ohio as a majority of the officers shall choose, and to be afterwards divided among the said officers and soldiers in due proportion, according to the laws of Virginia."

It further appears that Colonel Archibald Loughrey, father of the above-named claimants, some time during the summer of 1781, raised several companies of volunteers, of which he was chosen commander, for the purpose of joining the forces of General George Rogers Clark in the expedition against the Mohawk and Seneca Indians, inhabiting the country now belonging to Ohio. That in August, 1781, he marched with his men to Wheeling, Ohio, expecting to join the forces under General Clark; but when he and his men arrived at Wheeling, they found General Clark had left that place a few days before they arrived, but had left boats for Colonel Loughrey and his men to follow them. That they took the boats thus left for them, but somewhere near the mouth of the Big Miami river Colonel Loughrey and his men landed to cook and eat some food, and were attacked by a large body of Indians, and Loughrey and a number of his men were killed, and the remainder taken prisoners by the Indians, and never joined the forces under General Clark, as was intended.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no objection, and the bill will be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. The Clerk will read the next bill.

Mr. COBB. I presume it is now too late for me to object to that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. COBB. I am not a very young man, and I cannot jump up with rapidity enough to get an objection in time. This bill has been before the committee of which I am a member, four times, and has been rejected every time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair heard no objection made to this bill before it was laid aside to be reported to the House.

JOHN B. HAND.

An act (S. No. 136) for the relief of John B. Hand.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the heirs of John B. Hand, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,340.

It appears, from the report, that Mr. Hand became the purchaser of certain Indian reservations under the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, and paid to the Indians, according to contract, fifty cents per acre for the land so purchased. Afterwards the President of the United States (General Jackson) directed the patents to be withheld until Hand should pay an additional sum of seventy-five cents per acre. This Hand agreed to do. In December, 1838, A. A. Kincannon, Esq., was appointed an agent by the President to investigate, adjust, and settle the matter in dispute, growing out of the purchase of these reservations. To this agent Hand paid the additional seventy-five cents per acre; and Kincannon reported the payment to the Department. He failed, however, to account for the money, and subsequently died insolvent. The Department refused to acknowledge the validity of the payment, and required Hand again to pay seventy-five cents per acre for the land, which he did, protesting that it was unjust. The official correspondence exhibits the facts that Kincannon was the agent of the Government; that he received the money, a part on the 6th of February, 1840, and the balance on the 22d of February, 1841; and that no objection was made to its reception until March, 1843. Then, for the first time, the Secretary of War notified the agent that the currency in which the payment was made had depreciated, and that the Government would not receive it.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

M. M. MARMADUKE.

A bill (H. R. No. 505) for the relief of M. M. Marmaduke and others.

Mr. KELSEY. I have an amendment to offer to that bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to it.

BREVET MAJOR JAMES L. DONALDSON.

An act (S. No. 145) for the relief of Brevet Major James L. Donaldson, assistant quartermaster, United States Army.

The bill directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, in settling the accounts of Brevet Major James L. Donaldson, to allow him a credit for $400, being the amount of public funds stolen while in his possession as acting assistant quartermaster of the Army, near Monterey, in Mexico, on the 10th of October, 1846.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

HORATIO BOULTBEE.

A bill (H. R. No. 506) for the relief of Horatio Boulton.

The bill appropriates, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $515 to the administrator of Horatio Boulton, deceased, being payment in full for a stack of wheat belonging to Boulton, which was burned by the troops of the United States on the 21st of February, 1847, at Agua Nueva, in Mexico.

It appears, from the statement of Brigadier General Worth, made at New York, in August, 1848, that, while he was in command of the advance of Major General Taylor's army, the petitioner was employed by the quartermaster's department to collect supplies of flour, corn, and forage, for the use of Taylor's army. The General states that, in compliance with this engagement, the petitioner made a deposit of unthrashed wheat at Agua Nueva, over which a guard was placed to insure its safety, by General Butler, at the instance of General Worth. An order from Major General Butler, dated 2d January, 1847, is produced, which grants a safeguard to "the wheat belonging to Mr. Boulton, at Agua Nueva," as having been "contracted for by the United States." It appears that, in December, 1846, Lieutenant Colonel Thomas, deputy quartermaster general, saw several stacks of wheat at Agua Nueva. He left early in January, 1847, with Worth's division; and he refers to Captain Davis as one who was there in February, 1847, acting as quartermaster in Wool's division, and who probably knew most about it. Captain Davis testifies that one stack of wheat was burned at Agua Nueva on the night of the 21st of February, 1847, by the troops of the United States, and that it contained, probably, from one to two hundred bushels of grain—not more. He testifies that he had an "accurate knowledge" about this wheat, as his duties called him to the hacienda of Agua Nueva every day. He heard Boulton setting up some contract as having been made by him with General Worth's command; but that contract "was not recognized by the quartermaster in General Wool's command." The committee are inclined to accept the proof as persuasive sufficiently to the conclusion that Boulton had one stack of wheat, unthrashed, at Agua Nueva, on the night of the 21st, and that it was destroyed by the troops under General Taylor's command. Colonel Humphrey Marshall, who was in command at Agua Nueva, on the night of the 21st of February, 1847, and who saw the conflagration at Agua Nueva, furnishes his statement, which establishes the fact that a stack of wheat straw, (supposed to contain grain) was burned, but does not know who was the owner of it.

The committee think that it may be accepted as true, on the whole evidence, that the petitioner had acquired a title to the wheat prior to its being burned. The only question which remained was to ascertain its probable quantity and value. The petitioner files his own statement, and a deposition from one Mexican who says he sold the wheat to Mr. Boulton at $— per cargo. How much a "cargo" is, the committee has no evidence. It is technically "a load;" but how large or small, the term itself does not denote. Captain Davis is positive that the quantity of wheat at Agua Nueva did not exceed two hundred bushels in the grain. He does not place a value upon it. The quantity estimated by Colonel Marshall, from the volume of the stack, would show that the estimate of the petitioner is exorbitant and particularly extravagant. Under all the proof in the case, the committee reports in favor of allowing the petitioner for the wheat, the sum of $515, which is at seventy cents per bushel for seven hundred and fifty bushels.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to amend the bill by striking out "$515," and inserting in lieu thereof "$588 50." I move the amendment upon the direction of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass, with an amendment.

WILLIAM B. DODD AND OTHERS.

A bill (H. R. No. 507) for the relief of William B. Dodd and others.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of the appropriation to complete the road from Merwota to the Big Sioux river, contained in the act approved March 3, 1855, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1856, and for other purposes," into the hands of who is thereby appointed a commissioner to dispose of the same, the sum of $3,270, the same having been estimated for in said appropriation, and being for completing a part of said road, to be paid out by him as follows, to wit: The said commissioner shall give notice to all persons having claims against William B. Dodd, for labor or materials furnished in the construction of said road, by publication in a newspaper of general circulation in the neighborhood where said road is situated, for ninety days, and by posting written or printed notices in three public places in each county through which said road passes, to present and prove their claims within ninety days aforesaid; and all such claims, so presented and proved within the time limited, shall be paid to the parties respectively, and the residue, after the liquidation of such claims, and the payment of the expenses of the commission, shall be paid to the said William B. Dodd.

Mr. REAGAN. Is that a private bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is on the Calendar as such, and it is for the relief of an individual.

Mr. PHELPS, of Minnesota. I move to fill the blank in the bill by inserting the name of Henry A. Swift, of St. Peter's, Minnesota.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Why is that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then we had better examine this bill, if it is not known.

Mr. PHELPS, of Minnesota. I ask the consent of the House to make an explanation. The report will explain the character of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the report be read, and then the gentleman can make his verbal explanation.

Mr. KELSEY. I object.

The bill was passed over.

At a subsequent time,

Mr. PHELPS, of Minnesota, said: The gentleman from New York, I understand, withdraws his objection to the explanation.

Mr. KELSEY. I withdraw my objection if the gentleman from Tennessee withdraws his objection to the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will withdraw it to hear what reason the gentleman can give why he should substitute a name to fill the blank in the bill.

Mr. PHELPS, of Minnesota. I will merely say, I move to fill the blank with the name of Henry A. Swift, that is all. I now ask that the report be read for the information of the House.

The report which was read shows that the memorialist was engaged in the construction of a private road from Rockbend, a short distance above Traverse des Sioux, to St. Paul. While thus engaged, Captain J. L. Reno, brevet captain of the ordnance department, in surveying the military road provided for by act of Congress, known as the Big Sioux and Mendota military road, came upon the road being constructed by the memorialist, and adopted it as a part of the said military road provided for by act of Congress. The petitioner was to have been paid for said private road by subscription, previous to its adoption by the Government; but $300, however, were subscribed for the same up to the time Captain Reno adopted it as a part of the Government road. After such adoption, Captain Reno having estimated the cost of the same, embraced it in the estimate for the completion of the military road, and, upon such an estimate, Congress made an appropriation for the same. In Executive Document No. 97, first session, Thirty-Third Congress, will be found, in Captain Reno's report, the following reference to it:

"Opposite Traverse des Sioux we struck a road, newly cut, from Rockbend (a short distance above Traverse des Sioux) to St. Paul, by Captain Dodd, of Minnesota. This gentleman, with a surveyor and ten men and two teams, had been employed one hundred and nine days in cutting out this road and bridging the streams. It materially assisted our survey, and enabled us to get through the 'Big Woods' several weeks sooner than we would otherwise have done without this, our only guide among this unexplored labyrinth of lakes and marshes.

"I have included in the estimates the cost of cutting out this road, and take pleasure in recommending that Captain Dodd and his party be paid for their labor out of the appropriation for making the Mendota military road. In his estimate, which was before Congress at the time it made the appropriation, which is found in the same document, he has a distinct item: 'Add, for cost of Dodd's road, &c., &c., $3,270.'" The evidence before the committee satisfactorily proves that the actual expense incurred by Captain Dodd in making that road exceeded that sum. It is proven that Dodd never received a cent but $300 by private subscription, the adoption of the same by the Government having obviated the necessity of subscriptions. The committee think that the intention of Congress, in making the appropriation including this item, was, that the memorialist should be paid for the road constructed by him. The committee accordingly report a bill to carry out the intent of the previous act, the accounting officer having refused to pay the said Dodd the cost of said road. The bill, it will be found, appoints a commissioner to disburse the said amount. This is done in order to secure to the workmen employed on the same the amount due them for their labor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then objected to by Mr. MORGAN.

ELIAZER WILLIAMS.

A bill (H. R. No. 508) for the relief of Eleazer Williams, sole heir of Mary Ann Williams, and Thomas Williams, deceased. [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.]

WILLIAM B. DRAPER.

A bill (H. R. No. 509) for the relief of the legal representatives of William B. Draper. [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.]

GEORGE H. HOWELL.

A bill (H. R. No. 510) for the relief of George H. Howell.

The bill directs the proper accounting officers to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Dr. George H. Howell, an assistant surgeon in the Navy, the increased pay attaching to his increased rank as assistant surgeon, from the commencement of his increased rank to the time of the actual issue of his commission from the Navy Department.

The report shows that the petitioner, at the time of the examination of other assistant surgeons of his date, was absent on a cruise off the coast of Africa, from which he could not return until seven months after said examination. Upon his return he was examined and promoted, but allowed pay only from the date of the actual issuing of his commission from the Department, and not from the date of his increased rank, making a balance as against him of $298 61.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

NEHEMIAH S. DRAPER AND OTHERS.

A bill (H. R. No. 511) for the relief of Nehemiah S. Draper and William Holden, heirs-at-law of Mary Draper, deceased.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Nehemiah S. Draper and William Holden, of Providence, Rhode Island, heirs-at-law and legal representatives of Mary Draper, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,416 66, for money due to her as the widow of Paul Draper, late a captain's clerk in the Navy.

The report states that Paul Draper, formerly of Providence, Rhode Island, was a captain's clerk in the Navy of the United States, and was on board the United States ship L'Insurgente, in the year 1800, when she was lost at sea with all on board; that he left a widow, Mary Draper, who died on the 3d March, 1853, and children, of whom the petitioner is the only survivor; and that William Holden, a grandchild, and the petitioner, are the only heirs-at-law of Paul Draper, and of his widow, Mary Draper.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

ELIJAH CLOSE.

A bill (H. R. No. 512) for the relief of Elijah Close, of Tennessee.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Elijah Close, of Washington county, Tennessee, on the list of invalid pensioners, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 3d of December, 1855, and to continue during his natural life.

The report states that the petitioner, Elijah Close, enlisted in the service of the United States at Germantown, North Carolina, on the 10th of August, 1812, for the term of five years; was marched to the Canada frontier, where, during the war with Great Britain, he participated in four engagements with the enemy, one of which was at Plattsburg. After active service on the Canada frontier was over, he was transferred to the barracks at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, where, during the month of August, 1815, whilst in the service of the United States, he sustained severe injuries to his left side by a fall from the barracks, which, from some cause, appears to have given way. The fall bruised and injured his entire left side, and was so severe that he lay insensible for many weeks, and the injuries became permanent. He was subsequently honorably discharged.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM HOWELL.

A bill (H. R. No. 513) granting an invalid pension to William Howell, of Tennessee.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of William Howell, of Tennessee, on the invalid pension roll, and that he be paid a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing on the 23d of February, 1858, and continuing during his life.

The report shows that, from the evidence filed, William Howell enlisted on 15th July, 1812, for eighteen months, under Captain Martin Hawkins, in the twenty-seventh regiment of infantry; was transferred shortly after to the company of Captain Thornton S. Posey, in the same regiment. Whilst on his way from Fort Knox to Fort Harrison, with a load of provisions for the army, he was shot in the left breast by a ball fired from a gun in the hands of an Indian; from the effects of that wound he has never recovered, but is now wholly disabled from obtaining a living by manual labor.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

CONRAD SCHROEDER.

A bill (H. R. No. 514) granting an invalid pension to Conrad Schroeder.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Conrad Schroeder, who was a captain in the Louisville legion during the war with Mexico, on the invalid pension roll, and pay him a pension at the rate of $13 33 per month, commencing on the 22d January, 1858, and continuing during life.

It appears from the report, that Conrad Schroeder was a captain in the Louisville legion, commanded by Colonel Ormsby, during the war with Mexico; that at the time he left his home in Louisville, Kentucky, for the seat of war, he was a stout, hearty man, weighing two hundred and sixty pounds; that in consequence of heat, water, and marching through marshes, he became severely afflicted in his feet, to such an extent that his big toe on the left foot became a running ulcerous sore, and finally it became necessary to amputate it. After the amputation of the toe, he was seized with congestion of the lungs, occasioned, as the surgeons state, by the too sudden stoppage of the ulcerous sore. He is now an invalid on account of the hemorrhage of the lungs, as fully appears by the sworn affidavits of S. N. Hall and M. Pyles, who are certified to be physicians in good standing. The evidence of service and disability is further sustained by the sworn affidavits of the lieutenants and sergeants who served under Captain Schroeder.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

ALEXANDER S. BEAN.

A bill (H. R. No. 515) granting an invalid pension to Alexander S. Bean, of Pennsylvania.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Alexander S. Bean, of Pennsylvania, on the invalid pension roll at the rate of eight dollars per month, and pay him at that rate from the 29th of May, 1856, during his natural life.

It appears, from the report, that Bean was a private in the company of Captain Moses Canan, of the Pennsylvania militia, during the war of 1812; that in November, 1812, he was attacked with fever, gravel, and rheumatism, in consequence of which he was discharged on a surgeon's certificate as being unfit for duty. The original certificate of the surgeon is filed with the papers. Captain Moses Canan, under whom he served, swears to his service and disease contracted while in service. I. P. Cummins and James Carrington, who are certified to be respectable surgeons of Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania, swear to his disability, and belief that he is totally disabled.

No objection being made the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

MICHAEL A. DAVENPORT.

A bill (H. R. No. 516) for the relief of Michael A. Davenport, of Illinois.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Michael A. Davenport, of Illinois, on the invalid pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, and pay him a pension, at that rate, from the 5th of March, 1858, during his natural life.

It appears from the report that the petitioner was a private in the company of Captain William Daugherty, in the second regiment of Kentucky infantry, in the war with Mexico; that he was wounded in the shoulder during the engagement at Buena Vista, on the 23d February, 1847. Captain William Daugherty, under whom he served, makes affidavit to the facts set forth in the petition. H. P. Sanders and T. Welch, who are certified to be credible and reputable surgeons, make affidavit to his present condition, and the nature of his wound. Hon. A. Snaw, a member of the House from the seventh congressional district of Illinois, furnishes a statement that he is personally acquainted with the applicant, and knows that he is a cripple for life, and wholly unable to obtain a living by manual labor.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM ALLEN.

An act (S. No. 117) for the relief of William Allen, of Portland, in the State of Maine.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to cause the name of William Allen to be placed on the pension list, at the rate of six dollars per month, from and after the passage of the act, the pension to continue during his life, and to be in lieu of the pension to which he is now by law entitled.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

MARY C. HAMILTON.

A bill (H. R. No. 518) to continue the pension heretofore paid to Mary C. Hamilton, widow of Captain Fowler Hamilton, late of the United States Army.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to continue the name of Mrs. Mary C. Hamilton on the pension rolls, at the same rate of pension allowed her under the act passed for her benefit and approved March 1, 1854, payment to commence from and after the expiration of the act, and to continue for five years from the date of the passage of the act.

The report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions was read. Captain Hamilton, it appears from the rolls, was appointed a second lieutenant of dragoons on the 1st of July, 1840; promoted first lieutenant August 31, 1843; appointed major in the tenth infantry April 9, 1847; and promoted to lieutenant colonel in the sixteenth infantry May 23, 1848. On the disbandment of this regiment at the close of the Mexican war, he was reappointed in his former position of first lieutenant second dragoons, August 5, 1848, under fourth section of act of July 19, 1848; promoted captain of second dragoons July 25, 1850, and died August 8, 1851, on the El Paso road, while in discharge of the duties of the service. It appears that he served with distinction in the Florida war, and throughout the Mexican war. During the latter war he rose by rapid promotion to the rank of lieutenant colonel. Such was the admiration and respect for his gallant services in that war, that the Legislature of New Jersey, (his native State,) February 8, 1849, presented him a sword, inscribed "For gallant conduct displayed in the battles of Palto Alto, Resaca de la Palma, and Monterey, at Vera Cruz, and the Bridge of Madeline." During his service in the Mexican war his leg was broken by the kick of a horse, the wound from which never having healed entirely, cooperating with chronic diarrhea, there also contracted, greatly debilitated his strength and undermined his constitution.

In August, 1851, on the frontier of Texas, while in pursuit of a band of marauding Indians, he died suddenly of exhaustion, produced by the exposure and hardship of the expedition, operating on a constitution already enfeebled from the hardships and injuries of previous service. He died, as testified by Major Merrill, his commanding officer, under whose orders he was acting, "in the field, and in the discharge of his duty, and I am satisfied (Major Merrill says) that the expedition was the direct cause of his death." The deceased has left a widow and child in indigent circumstances, and the committee think that they should be indemnified for the irreparable loss of the husband and father, whose life was sacrificed in the service of the country, and in the line and discharge of duty.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

WILLIAM BULLOCK.

A bill (H. R. No. 520) for the relief of William Bullock.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of William Bullock upon the roll of invalid pensions, and that said Bullock be paid a pension at the rate of six dollars a month from the 1st day of January, 1854.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions report that there is good and sufficient evidence of said Bullock having rendered service in the war of 1812; that he received severe injuries while in the line of his duty, which now unfit him for labor.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

ANTHONY WALTER BAYARD.

A bill (H. R. No. 521) increasing the pension of Anthony Walter Bayard, of Bellefonte, in the State of Pennsylvania.

The bill provides that the pension now received by Anthony Walter Bayard, of Bellefonte, in the State of Pennsylvania, be increased to twenty dollars per month, and that the pension be paid him from the 1st day of January, 1852, deducting the amount of the pension he has already received since that date; and that hereafter his pension shall be twenty dollars per month during his life, instead of eight dollars per month, which he now receives.

It appears, from the report, that the petitioner was a private in the war of 1812, and served in the wars with the Indians in the Northwest, and that he was severely wounded upon three occasions, by which he is wholly disabled, and for which he was placed on the pension roll, in 1844, at the rate of eight dollars per month. He is now poor, very helpless, and decrepit. He was a very daring and valuable soldier. At the siege of Fort Harrison the Indians succeeded in setting fire to one of the block-houses, which communicated to the roof of the soldiers' barracks. The commanding officer called for volunteers to go upon the roof, in point-blank shot of the enemy's rifles, and extinguish the fire. The petitioner and another soldier volunteered, and mounted the burning roof. His companion was instantly shot dead, and the petitioner badly wounded. He succeeded in extinguishing the fire. This service was, at the time, regarded by the officers as most hazardous, and of great value to the American forces. The petitioner claims that his disability is total, rendering him dependent; that it results from wounds received whilst rendering most gallant, hazardous, and valuable services; and that, in such a case, a pension of eight dollars per month is not sufficient.

Mr. QUITMAN moved to amend the bill by striking out "twenty dollars" and inserting "ten dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

WRIGHT FORE.

A bill (H. R. No. 522) for the relief of Wright Fore.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Wright Fore on the invalid pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 9th of November, 1852, and to continue during his natural life.

It appears that the petitioner enlisted as a private in the mounted company of Captain David Smith, in Colonel Coffee's brigade of Tennessee troops, in October, 1813. That in the battle of Talladega, on the 9th of November, 1813, he was wounded in the left shoulder by a rifle ball fired from the camp of the enemy, which so disabled him as to render him unfit for duty; he was considered dangerously wounded, and left at Fort Strother; was carried from there to the hospital at Huntsville, Alabama, where he remained until February following, when he was sent for by his friends and taken home.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

WYATT GRIFFITH.

A bill (H. R. No. 523) for the relief of Wyatt Griffith.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Wyatt Griffith, of Tennessee, on the invalid pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, from the 20th of June, 1854, and pay him at that rate during the term of his natural life.

It appears, from the report, that Wyatt Griffith enlisted as a private soldier at Ashe Court-House, North Carolina, under Lieutenant Wiley Gordon, on the 8th of September, 1814, and served in Captain Brannon's, afterwards Captain Parker's, company, Colonel Hamilton's third rifle regiment, North Carolina infantry, for and during the war with Great Britain; and for this service bounty land warrant No. 8,291, for one hundred and sixty acres, issued to him on 21st January, 1817. While marching from North Carolina towards the Canada frontier, about the 1st of December, 1814, and when near Halifax Court-House, from fatigue and exposure he took cold, which settled into rheumatism, and disabled him from service most of the time until his discharge, and has continued ever since. The disability consists of a collection and hardening of humors in the right hip joint, which has dislocated the joint, and rendered him incurably lame and totally disabled for life.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

FRANCIS CARVER.

A bill (H. R. No. 524) for the relief of Francis Carver.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Francis Carver on the invalid pension roll at the rate of eight dollars per month, and to pay him at that rate from the 18th of December, 1857, and continue during his natural life.

It appears from the report that Francis Carver has been, for a period of seventeen years, a soldier in the Army of the United States, having served through the war with Mexico. After that war he was ordered to the frontiers of Texas, where, for eight or nine months he was in active service, exposed to the damps and cold of winter, without tent or covering. During that service he contracted the disease with which he now suffers. The certificate of J. A. Thompson, acting surgeon of the military asylum at Harrodsburg, Kentucky, states that the petitioner is laboring under a disease called St. Vitus's dance; that he is wholly disabled, &c.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

ROBINSON GAMMON.

A bill (H. R. No. 525) for the relief of Robinson Gammon.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Robinson Gammon, of Roxbury, in the county of Oxford, Maine, upon the roll of invalid pensions, at the rate of eight dollars per month, from the 3d of December, 1856, during his life.

It appears that from the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that Gammon, on or about the 10th of September, 1814, was called out on an alarm to serve in the war declared by the United States against Great Britain on the 18th of June, 1812; that at the time of the alarm the petitioner lived in Buckfield, in Maine; that he marched from Buckfield to Portland, in a company commanded by Captain Chase; that after his arrival at Portland he was drafted into Captain James Harlow's company of Colonel Ryerden's regiment of Massachusetts militia, and remained in service forty days, and was honorably discharged therefrom; that the march from Buckfield was a forced march, in which he contracted a disease in his feet and legs, which has continued from that time up to the present. The disease has continued to increase, until the petitioner is now a cripple, without any hope of recovery.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

FREDERICK SMITH.

A bill (H. R. No. 526) for the relief of Frederick Smith.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Frederick Smith on the invalid pension roll, at the rate of four dollars per month, and to pay him at that rate from the 1st of February, 1858, during his natural life.

It appears that the petitioner enlisted into the service of the United States as a private in the company of Captain W. H. Irwin, of the eleventh infantry, in May, 1846; that on the 11th of June, 1847, he was wounded at the National Bridge, in Mexico, by a slug, which entered the left side of his head, and became "embedded between the external and internal plates of the cranium; near the posterior margin of left parietal bone," the ball or slug was extracted on the 5th May, 1856.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

PHINEAS G. PEARSON.

A bill (H. R. No. 527) for the relief of Phineas G. Pearson.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Phineas G. Pearson on the list of invalid pensioners, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 22d of January, 1858, and continue during life.

It appears, from the report, that Phineas G. Pearson enlisted in 1846, as a private in the company of Captain David Irie, company C, second regiment of Ohio volunteers, commanded by Colonel Morgan; that he marched with his company from Highland county, Ohio, to Camargo, in Mexico, and continued in the service of the United States until the 13th September, 1846, when he was discharged from the service on account of a surgeon's certificate of disability. The petitioner states that, while in Camargo, in the latter part of August, 1846, he was attacked with measles, which were very prevalent in the camp, was very sick for about two weeks, when he partially recovered; but in a few days after took a relapse, and became very sick with diarrhea, attended with fever, and, finally, his left leg below the knee became affected with severe pains, and was so much swollen he was unfitted for service, and was consequently discharged. He returned to the United States, and suffered very great pain on account of the ulceration of his leg, until the 10th of December, 1851, when he was compelled to submit to the amputation of the leg above the knee, in order to save his life.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

JUDITH NOTT.

A bill (H. R. No. 528) for the relief of Judith Nott.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Judith Nott upon the pension roll of the United States, at the rate of nine dollars per month, the pension to commence and be computed from the 1st January, 1835, and to continue during her widowhood.

The report having been read, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

JOHN C. RATHBUN.

A bill (H. R. No. 529) for the relief of John C. Rathbun.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of John C. Rathbun on the list of invalid pensioners, at the rate of four dollars per month to commence on the 15th February, 1858, and to continue during life.

The report states that John C. Rathbun enlisted as a private on the 10th May, 1814, in the company of Captain Claudius C. Boughter, of the New York militia, and served until the 8th November, 1814. It is alleged by the petitioner that he was taken prisoner by the enemy in August, 1814. At the time of being taken prisoner he received three wounds: one with a saber on the head, which fractured his skull; another with a saber on the left shoulder, which cut through the left shoulder blade; and another with a pistol ball, which passed through his left thigh, from which wounds he is unable to earn a living by manual labor.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

STEPHEN FELLOWS.

A bill (H. R. No. 530) for the relief of Stephen Fellows.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Stephen Fellows on the invalid pension list, at the rate of four dollars per month, from the 20th of January, 1858, to continue during life.

It appears from the report that Stephen Fellows was a soldier in the Army during the war of 1812 under Captain Jonathan Stark, in the eleventh regiment of United States regulars; that he was wounded at the battle of Lunby's Lane in his left side by a piece of shell, his ribs were broken, in consequence of which he was disabled, and is now unable to procure a living by manual labor.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN PERRY.

A bill (H. R. No. 531) for the relief of John Perry, of Illinois.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of John Perry, of Illinois, on the list of invalid pensioners, at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing on the 15th of February, 1858, and to continue during his natural life.

It appears from the report, that John Perry was a private in company C, commanded by Captain John M. Moore, in the second regiment of Illinois volunteers, commanded by Colonel James Collins; that he enlisted on the 15th of July, 1847, to serve during the war; that he marched to the seat of war, and while in the line of his duty at Puebla, in Mexico, in March, 1848, he was attacked with serofulous irictus, which has so affected his eyes as to produce almost total blindness.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

EBENEZER HITCHCOCK.

A bill (H. R. No. 532) for the relief of Ebenezer Hitchcock.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Ebenezer Hitchcock, of Massachusetts, on the invalid pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, and to cause him to be paid at that rate from the 1st of February, 1858, during his natural life.

It appears from the report, that Hitchcock enlisted into the United States Army on the 23d of August, 1808, for five years, served out his time, and was honorably discharged; that in March, 1813, he was appointed wagon-master by Lieutenant Colonel Bacchus, and had the promise of extra pay. He served five months as a wagon-master, and got only ordinary wages. A few days previous to his discharge there came a storm of wind and rain, which compelled him to keep up for two days and nights, by which he took cold, which caused an abscess sore on his hip, which has so disabled him that he cannot get about to earn a living.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

SHOVE CHASE.

A bill (H. R. No. 533) for the relief of Shove Chase.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Shove Chase, of New York, upon the invalid pension list, at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing on the 1st of January, 1856, to continue during his natural life.

It appears from the report that Chase enlisted at Staten Island, in New York, the 19th of December, 1812, for one year in the war of 1812. That while in the service he had the misfortune to break his arm by a fall while passing from one post to another in the dark. He also proves by the surgeon of the Army who attended him, and also by the certificates of two surgeons of his own county; by the former, that he was in the line of his duty when the injury was received, and by the surgeons of his county, that the injury still continues. His neighbors certify that he has not, at any time, been qualified to perform manual labor, excepting with the right hand; that he has refused to receive or rather apply for a pension while he was able to earn his board by doing small favors for his neighbors. He is now aged and unable to support himself, the injury of his wrist increasing instead of getting better.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALLEN SMITH.

A bill (H. R. No. 534) for the relief of Allen Smith.

The bill authorizes and requests the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Allen Smith, of New Hampshire, upon the invalid pension list, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 21st of January, 1858, and continue during his natural life.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID WATSON.

A bill (H. R. No. 535) for the relief of David Watson.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of David Watson, of Georgia, upon the list of invalid pensioners, at the rate of four dollars per month, to commence on the 15th of February, 1858, and continue during his natural life.

It appears from the report that Watson was mustered into the service of the United States as a private in Captain Charles H. Nelson's company of Colonel Calhoun's regiment of Georgia volunteers, for during the then existing war with Mexico; that, while in the line of his duty in the service, he was attacked with diarrhea, which has continued until the present time, disabling him, in part, from obtaining his subsistence by manual labor.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

HEIRS OF JOHN M'DONOUGH.

A bill (H. R. No. 543) for the relief of the legal representatives of John McDonough, deceased, late of Louisiana.

The bill confirms the claim numbered 39 in the report of the register and receiver of the land office at New Orleans, made on the 22d of November, 1837, in the name of John McDonough, to a tract of about one hundred and seventy-seven superficial arpents of land; and directs that a patent shall issue, as in ordinary cases, to the legal representatives of McDonough, provided that this confirmation shall only be construed as a relinquishment of all right and title of the United States, and shall not prejudice the legal claim of any other party, should such exist.

The report states, that on the 22d November, 1837, the register and receiver of the land office at New Orleans, under the act of 6th February, 1835, reported on this case as follows:

"No. 39.—John McDonough claims, in virtue of complete title or patent derived from the Government of France, in the year 1769, a tract of land lying in the parish of Jefferson, near the city of New Orleans, and on the same side of the river Mississippi, commencing at a distance of eighty arpents from the said river Mississippi, and running back or in the rear from thence, with the continuous lines of the front tract of twenty-two arpents on the river, a distance of about forty-nine and one third arpents in depth, until one of the side lines intersects the other in a point, including (as is more particularly shown by a plan drawn by Benjamin Buisson, a surveyor of said parish) within said lines the quantity of one hundred and seventy-seven and one third superficial arpents, more or less." No action was ever taken by Congress upon this report. In 1844, Congress passed an act authorizing the settlement of private land claims in Louisiana by judicial proceedings before the United States courts, in cases where the title set up was imperfect but equitable.

As there was no tribunal with power to declare definitely what claims were supported by perfect titles, John McDonough, as his only recourse at law, brought suit before the United States court in New Orleans, to test the validity of his claim to the land now in question. That court, in 1849, gave judgment in his favor. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, where, in 1853, the judgment of the district court was reversed, on the ground that the court below had no jurisdiction of the case under the said law of Congress, inasmuch as the title of McDonough was claimed to be, and was adjudged to be, a perfect title. In this anomalous condition, thrown out of court because his title was not found to be imperfect, with no power to which an appeal can be taken, except to the legislative department of the Government, the representatives of McDonough ask that Congress will, without delay, confirm their claim to the said tract of land, which has been held in undisputed possession, occupancy, and cultivation, since before 1760.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

DEMPSEY PITTMAN.

An act (S. No. 95) explanatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of Dempsey Pittman," approved August 16, 1856.

The bill provides that the act approved August 16, 1856, entitled "An act for the relief of Dempsey Pittman," be so construed as to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to pay to Dempsey Pittman the compensation and allowances of a colonel of infantry for the period of five months, in full consideration for his services in Florida in 1838.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

BENJAMIN WAKEFIELD.

A bill (H. R. No. 547) for the relief of Benjamin Wakefield.

The bill authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to Benjamin Wakefield the difference of pay between that of master's mate and boatswain, from the 1st of January, 1848, to the 19th of January, 1850.

The petition of Benjamin Wakefield is, that he be allowed the difference of pay between that of a master's mate and boatswain, while performing the duties of the latter grade on board the United States ship Preble. In an affidavit attached to his petition he deposes, that he entered the Navy of the United States, at the navy-yard at Brooklyn, New York, on the 24th of June, 1846; that on the 15th of August following he was transferred from the navy-yard to the United States ship Preble, Commodore W. P. Shields, and by him was ordered to perform the duties of boatswain of the ship, there being no officer of that grade attached to the ship, although the regulations of the Navy Department allowed such an officer; that, at the request of Commodore Shields, the memorialist wrote to Hon. George Bancroft, then Secretary of the Navy, asking that he should be appointed by the Department a boatswain, or an increase of pay, should he be continued in the performance of the duties of that grade; that the Secretary of the Navy, in his reply, directed to Commodore Shields, held forth inducements to the memorialist to hold on to the situation to which Commodore Shields had appointed him, until a vacancy should occur for promotion in that grade; that the memorialist proceeded to sea in the ship, and on arriving at the port of Callao, he again applied, on the 29th of February, 1848, through Commodore Jones, commanding the Pacific squadron, to the Secretary of the Navy for an increase of pay or an appointment as boatswain; that the Secretary of the Navy, under date of 18th of May, 1848, issued an order to Commodore Jones to the following effect: "You are hereby authorized to give acting appointments to Benjamin Wakefield, &c., and drop his rate as master's mate on board the Preble, to take effect on the 1st of January last."

Subsequent to the receipt of the order, the Preble sailed for San Francisco, thence to Monterey and Mazatlan, and thence to China, where, having cruised for a length of time, she returned to the Pacific station, communicating in September, 1849, with Commodore Jones, at the Sandwich Islands, and subsequently, in December of the same year, proceeded to San Francisco, California; that on or about the 15th of January, 1850, the above-named order from the Navy Department to Commodore Jones was communicated to the memorialist for the first time, by Commander Glynn, then in command of the Preble; that the memorialist was at that time in bad health, and severely afflicted with rheumatism, induced, as he believes, by a continuous service of three years and seven months, in consequence of which he was compelled to decline said appointment, being entirely unfit for service, and to seek relief on shore; that he was discharged from the ship on the 19th of January, 1850.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

J. WILLCOX JENKINS.

An act (S. No. 74) for the relief of J. Willcox Jenkins.

The bill directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay J. Willcox Jenkins the difference between the pay of captain's clerk and a purser of a first class sloop-of-war, from the 1st of January to the 30th April, 1856, during which time he was the acting purser of the sloop-of-war Jamestown.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

FABIUS STANLEY.

An act (S. No. 203) for the relief of Fabius Stanley.

The bill directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to Fabius Stanley, as full compensation for his services during the time he was actually on duty and attached to the navy-yard at Mare Island, California, at the rate of $2,100 per annum, deducting therefrom the pay he received for his services during that period.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. KELSEY. There are eight adverse reports from the Court of Claims upon the Calendar, next in order; and I move that they be passed over.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that they be reported to the House with the recommendation that the reports be concurred in.

They were read, as follows:

An adverse report (C. C. No. 167) in the case of Charles Wilkes.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 168) in the case of William Davenport.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 169) in the case of William B. Fitzgerald.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 170) in the case of John L. Worden.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 171) in the case of John H. Waggaman.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 172) in the case of John L. Wirt.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 173) in the case of Jonas P. Levy.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 174) in the case of Logan Hunton.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. There are two reports which I should like to have excepted.

The CHAIRMAN. Which two?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Nos. 170 and 171. I move that they be reported to the House with the recommendation that they be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to; and then the remainder of the reports were laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that the reports be concurred in.

E. GEORGE SQUIER.

A bill (H. R. No. 553) for the relief of E. George Squier, of New York. [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.]

WILLIAM K. JENNINGS.

An act (S. No. 29) for the relief of William K. Jennings, and others. [Objected to by Mr. KELSEY.]

BASIL MIGNAULT.

A bill (H. R. No. 563) for the relief of the surviving children of Basil Mignault, an officer of the revolutionary war. [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.]

JOHN ROBB.

An act (S. No. 184) for the relief of John Robb [Objected to by Mr. LETCHER.]

MICHAEL NOURSE.

A bill (C. C. No. 8) for the relief of Michael Nourse. [Objected to by Mr. LETCHER.]

JOHN ROBB.

A bill (C. C. No. 5) for the relief of John Robb. [Objected to by Mr. LETCHER.]

ASBURY DICKINS.

A bill (C. C. No. 2) for the relief of Asbury Dickins. [Objected to by Mr. LETCHER.]

MOSES NOBLE.

A bill (C. C. No. 12) for the relief of Moses Noble. [Objected to by Mr. LETCHER.]

GEORGE A. MAGRUDER.

A bill (C. C. No. 11) for the relief of George A. Magruder.

Mr. LETCHER. That bill is reported with the recommendation that it do not pass. It ought not to have been here. I object to it.

GARDNER AND VINCENT.

A bill (H. R. No. 569) for the relief of Gardner and Vincent and others.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the production of satisfactory evidence, to audit and settle the several accounts of Gardner and Vincent; A. S. Gardner; A. F. Holmes; G. B. Murphy; C. C. Carlton; N. E. Crittenden; O. A. Brooks & Co. and W. Bingham & Co. for goods, &c., furnished the United States marine hospital at Cleveland, Ohio, during the superintendence of John Coon, and to pay the amounts found to be due.

It appears, from the report, that these several parties furnished various materials for the completion of the marine hospital at Cleveland, Ohio, in 1851. Mr. Coon, the late superintendent, certifies to this fact. He says: "These goods were furnished for the use of the United States marine hospital under my direction, as agent for the Government. All of the goods were used in preparing said hospital for the reception of patients, under instructions to me from the Secretary of the Treasury. The prices stated in the accounts were proper and reasonable, and the accounts have never been paid." This statement is sworn to by Mr. Coon, and the reason given for not paying the accounts is that the appropriation ran out before they were paid.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

LIEUTENANT LOOMIS L. LANGDON.

A bill (H. R. No. 590) for the relief of Loomis L. Langdon.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to credit the account of second Lieutenant Loomis L. Langdon, first artillery, United States Army, with $1,176 66; it being the amount stolen from his possession, at Fort Brown, on the night of the 23d of October, 1857.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Read the report. The CHAIRMAN. The report accompanying this bill has been mislaid. The Clerk has sent for it, and it will be read as soon as it can be found.

Mr. BRYAN. The circumstances are these: Lieutenant Loomis was stationed at Brownsville. There was a fire there, and his commanding officer ordered him, with his men, to extinguish the flames. During his absence on that duty, his chest was broken open and the money stolen. These are the facts as they appear in papers referred to the committee, and with which they were satisfied.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Was it his money or the money of the Government?

Mr. BRYAN. The money of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has the report in this case.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Read it.

It appears, from the report, which was read, that in the month of May, 1857, the assistant commissary of subsistence, United States Army, stationed at Brownsville, Texas, was ordered away from that post, and Lieutenant Loomis L. Langdon, of the first artillery, appointed to discharge the duties as acting assistant commissary of subsistence, and as such took charge of the Government funds. The following affidavit, made and sworn to by Lieutenant Langdon himself, details the particulars of the robbery:

"On the morning of the 24th of October, between the hours of three and five, my iron safe was opened by some person or persons, at present unknown, and $1,176 66 of public funds, belonging to the subsistence department of the United States Army, stolen therefrom. The key of this safe I always kept in my possession in my trunk, and the trunk key I carried with me. As soon as I heard of the robbery, I opened my trunk and found the safe key there. I always opened and closed the safe myself.

"The safe had been formerly kept in the quartermaster's building, but, not deeming it secure there, I had it removed to the office, a small room in front of the commissary store-house. This building is about five rods from the guard-house, with the office windows and door nearest the office looking out on the most frequented part of the garrison. The office door is an inner one. The store-house is under charge of the guard, and the sentinel on No. 1 walks within a few feet of the office, and in front of it. On the morning of the robbery, about one o'clock, a fire broke out in Brownsville, which is near Fort Brown. The fire, distant from the guard-house about thirty-five rods, raged so violently that it was deemed essential to the safety of the town to send the troops to aid the citizens. By order of the commanding officer, the whole command, with the exception of the guard, was absent, and the garrison, therefore, unusually exposed to the numerous thieves in the vicinity. The garrison and town of Brownsville have so often been the scenes of robberies, that unusual precautions have to be taken against thieves. I mention this to show what a bad neighborhood this is for the security of property. Scarcely a week passes without a robbery being committed in the town.

"Disbursing officers at this post have three times before been robbed, and in spite of sentinels almost at their very doors. The officers' quarters have been entered, and their property stolen. During the fire, ninety-five kegs of powder exploded, increasing the excitement by the loss of several valuable lives, and materially injuring all the buildings in the vicinity. In the garrison, the doors and windows of the different store-houses were violently thrown open in spite of iron fastenings. The thieves took advantage of the facilities afforded by the explosion, and the absence of the whole command at the fire, to rob me. The guard, perhaps, unconsciously partaking of the general excitement, had their attention drawn off their duty in some degree. The command saved the town by working at the fire till daylight, and thus for six hours the garrison was almost untenanted. Every precaution, with the means furnished me by Government, was taken by me to secure the property intrusted to my care.

"I had removed the safe from the place where it had been formerly kept by an officer in charge of it, not deeming it secure, and placed it in the office, where the sergeant could sleep by it, and where the office in which it was placed would be under the eyes of the guard. The only night the sergeant left it was the night of the fire; and then only at intervals to work with the rest of the command. During one of these intervals, the money was taken. As I always kept the key in my own possession, the thieves could not have obtained an impression from it."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID M'CLURE.

A bill (H. R. No. 571) for the relief of David McClure, administrator of Joseph McClure, deceased.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to David McClure, administrator of Joseph McClure, deceased, the sum of $107 64 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; it being the amount of interest collected from Joseph McClure, in his lifetime, on a judgment in favor of the United States Government, which it was afterwards ascertained McClure did not properly owe, and the amount of which judgment has been previously refunded to him by Congress.

It appears from the report, that Joseph McClure, as paymaster in the United States Army, received money to pay off his regiment; that he did pay the regiment, but that the vouchers for such payment were destroyed by fire at Buffalo; that the Government brought suit against the said McClure and his sureties for the sum of money for which he could show no vouchers, on account of their having been destroyed, and recovered the same; that one of his sureties was cognizant of the fact that the money was paid to the regiment; but, being a party defendant to the suit, his evidence was not admissible, which enabled the Government to carry the suit against them. Since that time, McClure reimbursed his sureties the amount recovered against them, and his administrator now petitions Congress to allow the estate the sum of the judgment paid, amounting to $551 36, with interest from the date of the payment.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY HUBBARD.

An act (S. No. 123) for the relief of Henry Hubbard.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out the interest portion of the bill.

Mr. GOODWIN. The interest here is allowed on well-settled principles of Government. This balance was admitted to be due, at the Treasury Department, and it is only asked that interest shall be paid from that time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to amend by striking out that portion of the bill.

The question was taken; and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it in order for the gentleman to make that objection now?

The CHAIRMAN. It is. The bill has not passed from the committee.

LEWIS W. BROADWELL.

A bill (H. R. No. 572) for the relief of Lewis W. Broadwell.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Lewis W. Broadwell, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $12,938, it being in full compensation for transporting the United States mails, in steamboats, from Vicksburg, Mississippi, to Grand Lake, Arkansas, from the 4th of September, 1854, to the 17th of April, 1857, at the rate of $5,000 per annum.

From the report, it appears that Captain Broadwell, in 1854, being in command of the steamboat P. H. Kimball, plying as a regular packet between New Orleans and other points on the Mississippi river, as far up as Grand Lake, in Arkansas, and finding that the residents at many landings and towns between Vicksburg and Grand Lake were without the means of mail communication, did, at the request and urgent solicitation of the residents at the points mentioned, and for their accommodation and convenience, take on board his steamer and transport mails and mail matter, delivered to him for that purpose by the postmasters of Vicksburg, Milliken's Bend, Brunswick Point, Pecan Grove, Tullula, Lake Providence, Ashton, and Princeton; and that he generally paid the drayage on the mails to and from his steamer to the post office at Vicksburg, received and delivered there. This service was continued, without intermission, from the 4th of September, 1854, to the 17th of April, 1857, when it was given up, and the Post Office Department employed Captain Porterfield, extending his contract to Napoleon. This service, Captain Broadwell alleges, was performed "under the employment of the postmasters at Vicksburg, Grand Lake, and the intermediate offices," but there being no contract with the Government, the Post Office Department is without authority to compensate him, and he asks remuneration at the hands of Congress.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

HASAM AND BREWSTER.

A bill (H. R. No. 573) for the relief of Thomas Hasam and B. S. Brewster.

The bill requires the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts of Thomas Hasam and B. S. Brewster, for services as inspectors of hulls and boilers at New Orleans, in Louisiana, and to allow them the irregular compensation from the date of their appointment as if they had been sworn and properly qualified.

The petitioners, as appears by the report, were appointed inspectors of hulls and boilers, on the 3d of December, 1852, under the ninth section of the act of Congress approved August 20, 1852. They immediately entered upon the discharge of their official duties, but neglected taking the oath required of them until the 12th of May, 1853. The supervising inspector testifies: "That on the 3d of December, 1852, Thomas Hasam and B. S. Brewster were designated as inspectors of hulls and boilers, and that immediately after their designation they went to work in discharge of the duties of the offices to which they had been designated, by preparing steamboats for inspection and other preliminary work." This statement is sworn to by Mr. P. H. Skipwith, supervising inspector. The Treasury circular of July 20, 1829, says: "Compensation cannot be allowed until these requisitions (oath of office) are complied with." The account of petitioners was therefore rejected for the services rendered from December 3 to May 12, following, and it is for this compensation they now ask.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

QUIETING LAND TITLES IN MAINE.

A bill (H. R. No. 574) to provide for quieting certain land titles in the late disputed territory in the State of Maine, and for other purposes. [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.]

GEORGE A. O'BRIEN.

An act (S. No. 92) for the relief of George A. O'Brien.

The bill directs that there be allowed and paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to George A. O'Brien, for his services as clerk in the office of the Second Auditor, from the 5th of July, 1845, to the 3d of March, 1846, the sum of $549 33.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

RUFUS DWINEL.

An act (S. No. 189) for the relief of Rufus Dwinel.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be paid to Rufus Dwinel, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $11,748 03, being for interest, at the rate of six per centum per annum, on the sum of $13,037 72, from the 4th of March, 1837, when the latter sum was due from the United States to said Dwinel's assignor, to March 11, 1852, when an appropriation was made for its payment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe this bill is all wrong. I suppose the person named in this bill was sued by the Government, and when the jury returned a verdict, they returned it against the Government, which, I presume, they had no authority to do. But with the understanding that the yeas and nays are to be ordered upon it in the House, I will not object to its being reported to the House, though I shall vote against it. [Cries of "Agreed."]

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT A. DAVIDGE.

A bill (H. R. No. 575) for the relief of Robert A. Davidge.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Robert A. Davidge $118 90, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full for his services as a temporary clerk in the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury from March 26 to April 30, 1857.

The report states that the claimant was employed in the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, by the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, as a temporary clerk, for thirty-six days, at the rate of pay of $1,200 per annum. The act of 1842 prohibits the employment of temporary clerks during the recess of Congress, except for specified purposes therein named; and hence Mr. Davidge was refused his pay, though the First Comptroller, Mr. Whittlesey, certified that he performed the duties. The claimant unquestionably performed the service, and is entitled to the pay, amounting to $118 90.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

JONAS P. KELLER.

An act (S. No. 67) for the relief of Jonas P. Keller.

The bill directs that $750 be allowed and paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Jonas P. Keller, in full for his services as a watchman or overseer of the executive building at the corner of F and Seventeenth streets, from the 1st of April, 1849, to the 30th of September, 1850.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

DOUGLASS OTTINGER.

A bill (H. R. No. 576) for the relief of Captain Douglass Ottinger.

The bill directs that there be paid to Captain Douglass Ottinger, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $10,000, in full compensation for the use of his invention of the life or surf car by the United States, and also to enable him further to test the practicability of adapting such car to the rescuing of passengers and crews during violent gales at sea.

The report states that Captain Douglass Ottinger, of the United States revenue service, represents that he is the sole inventor of the machine known as the life or surf car, and that it was the first invention whereby persons could be safely conveyed through heavy breaking waves from stranded vessels to the shore. He submits that he has voluntarily placed his invention at the life-saving stations of the United States, subject to the free use of the Government, unrestricted by patent rights. He asks some remunerative compensation for the labor and expense which the inventions have cost him, and also something, in addition, to enable him to test practically, at sea, its adaptation to rescue passengers and crews during violent gales.

The committee were satisfied that Captain Ottinger is the original inventor of the life or surf car, and that he has devoted the same to the use of the United States, and that the Government is now using them at fifty-two different stations on the coast. The evidence before the committee was conclusive as to the great value of the invention of Captain Ottinger as a means of saving life. The present Secretary of the Treasury, the Hon. Howell Cobb, in answer to a letter from the committee, says "it has proved of incalculable value in the saving of human life;" and he mentions the case of the wreck of the ship Ayrshire, on the Jersey coast, (when it was impossible for any boat to reach her in consequence of the heavy surf rolling in upon the beach,) where, by means of this invention, every one on board was saved—men, women, and children, and even infants in their mothers' arms. As Captain Ottinger, with a laudable public spirit, has, for many years, devoted his valuable invention to the use of the United States, and has received no compensation therefor, the committee deemed his claim for some remuneration not unreasonable.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN M'NIEL.

An act (S. No. 100) releasing to the legal representatives of John McNiel, deceased, the title of the United States to a certain tract of land.

Mr. COBB. This bill was ordered to be reported back from the Committee on Public Lands. Since it was reported, some facts have come to light which probably would change the views of the committee. I therefore object to it.

We are now through with the Calendar, I believe, and I desire to atone for a little piece of folly which I was guilty of some time since. Under a state of excitement, I objected to two House bills, (Nos. 447 and 448,) without even hearing the reports read. I acknowledge the folly, and ask leave of the committee to withdraw the objection I made to those bills.

Mr. GROW. I would suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that we go back upon the Calendar to bill No. 367, and take up those bills which did not have a proper consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I trust we shall now turn back and begin at the head of the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide that as the regular course of proceeding, unless the committee determine to rise.

Mr. BURNETT. I move that the committee rise and report the bills to the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope we will rise, for we have been here long enough for one day.

The motion was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks the unanimous consent of the committee to withdraw his objection to two cases which he has indicated.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to going back. Let us go to the head of the Calendar if you want to go through it again.

Mr. NICHOLS. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my objection to Senate bill (No. 73) authorizing Mrs. Jane Smith to enter certain lands in the State of Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee objects to going back. The committee having refused to rise, the Chair will now order the Clerk to begin at the commencement of the Calendar.

Mr. MILLSON. I move that the committee rise and report the bills; and I ask for tellers on that motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JEWETT and CLEMENS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes seventy-nine, noes not counted.

To the motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had the Private Calendar under consideration, and had directed him to report sundry bills to the House, some with and some without amendments, with a recommendation that they do pass; also sundry adverse reports from the Court of Claims, with a recommendation that some of them be concurred in and others be referred to the Committee of Claims.

D. O. DICKINSON.

Mr. CHAFFEE obtained the floor.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. With the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of House bill (No. 446) for the relief of D. O. Dickinson, a constituent of mine. It is a bill to pay him $108 75 for services rendered in connection with keeping a light in Waukegan harbor.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was brought before the House to be considered with the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House.

PRIVATE BILLS REPORTED BACK.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I now demand the previous question on the bills.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There is one bill there, Senate bill (No. 189) for the relief of Rufus Dwinel, which was reported to the House with the understanding that a separate vote should be had upon it by yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will propound the question to the House, on seconding the demand for the previous question upon all the bills. The bills will then be reported, and gentlemen can indicate those upon which they desire separate votes.

Mr. GROW. I think there is only one such bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there any other bill upon which a separate vote is desired?

Mr. COBB. I should like to have a separate vote on bill (No. 504) for the relief of Elizabeth McBrier, surviving child and heir of Colonel Archibald Loughry, deceased.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As we passed along the Calendar to-day many bills were read which I did not feel disposed to object to. I thought they were worthy of consideration, and did not like to obstruct their consideration by a single objection. I do, however, desire a separate vote upon those bills, and I desire to make the motion indicated by the Chair, that the bills be read over to-morrow, and any gentleman who desires a separate vote can ask for it.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. That will cut off all the bills remaining on the Calendar.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As it is suggested that it will retard the progress of business, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. GROESBECK. Objection was made to-day to the bill for the relief of William Rich, but the gentleman who made it afterwards offered to withdraw it. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of that bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that if this is the case of the late chargé to Mexico, I should have objected to it, if his colleague had not.

Mr. STANTON. I would suggest that the titles of the bills be read, and let gentlemen indicate such as they demand a separate vote upon.

The SPEAKER. If it is the pleasure of the House, the previous question will be seconded upon all the bills in gross. The titles will then be read, and separate votes can be taken upon such bills as gentlemen may designate.

Mr. STANTON. I think that will be the best course.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the previous question should be seconded upon all the bills to-night, the House could then adjourn, and gentlemen would have time over night to examine the bills, and be prepared in the morning to indicate such bills as they desire separate votes upon.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to say that I objected in committee to House bill (No. 362) for the relief of Mrs. Mary Ann Henry, because the pension of fifty dollars per month is more than is allowed to officers of the same grade by law. I understand that the gentleman having charge of the bill is willing to take thirty dollars per month, with the understanding that that amendment shall be made. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put, upon all the bills reported.

Mr. GARNETT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROW. I appeal to the gentleman from Virginia to allow us to pass such of the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House as there is no objection to, and then we can act upon the others to-morrow morning.

Mr. HOUSTON. The objection to that is, that I cannot tell what bills to designate, as those upon which I desire a separate vote, without taking some time to look over the list. If the House should now adjourn we should then have time to look over the list and be prepared to act upon them understandingly to-morrow.

Mr. GROW. If the gentleman objects to my proposition, of course I cannot press it.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If we adjourn without acting upon these bills to-night, we shall take up a great part of the day to-morrow with them, and shall do great injustice to the remainder of the cases on the Private Calendar. If gentlemen have attended to the progress of business in committee to-day, they do not need additional time to look over the lists to see what bills they want a separate vote upon. I think we ought to go through with these bills to-night, and then we can to-morrow go over again with that part of the Calendar which has heretofore been passed over.

Mr. GARNETT. I will withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. LETCHER. It strikes me that the most satisfactory mode of getting along with this business is to read over these bills to-night, and then in the morning indicate upon what ones a separate vote is desired. I take it, that if we undertake to pass these bills through to a vote to-night, we shall be likely to have the yeas and nays three times where we should have them but once in the morning.

Then, sir, I see nothing in the objection of my friend from Kentucky, about the remaining cases on the Calendar. To-morrow is not objection day; it is debating day, and you must either pass over those which give rise to debate, and which will give dissatisfaction to those gentlemen who desire to dispose of such bills, or you must take them up and dispose of them in their regular order; and I want to know of my friend from Kentucky how he will get through with the Calendar?

Mr. GROW. I see no objection to the proposition made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] to read over the list of bills which have been reported, and let gentlemen indicate upon what ones they desire a separate vote, pass such as there is no objection to, and allow the others to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The objection to that, I expect, is that there are gentlemen here now who have not been here during the day, and who want time to look over the list, in order to determine which bills to object to, and upon which to demand a separate vote.

Mr. LETCHER. There are, I understand, eighty-nine bills reported from the Committee of the Whole. Now, I understand that it is proposed to read over the titles of all these bills in ten minutes, and give gentlemen only that time to determine upon what bills they want a separate vote.

Mr. BURNETT. I will say to my friend from Virginia that, if he had been here all day listening to the reading of the bills and reports in committee, he would have prepared to determine without any delay what bills, in his judgment, ought to pass, and what ought not. I say to gentlemen that it is their own fault if they have not paid attention in committee to-day to the reading of bills, when a single objection would have prevented any bill from being reported; and now, to delay action in the House upon these bills until morning, would be doing injustice to the other cases on the Calendar. I hope these bills will be acted upon to-night, and that we shall go over the balance of the Calendar to-morrow.

Mr. LETCHER. I will say to my friend from Kentucky that I think I have been here to-day much more of the time than he has been.

Mr. BURNETT. I have been here the whole day, except while I was absent at dinner.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he has indulged this irregular debate long enough. The titles of the bills reported by the committee will now be read over, and gentlemen can indicate upon which ones they desire separate votes.

The following House bills and joint resolutions reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendment, and upon which a separate vote was not asked, were ordered to be severally engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time and passed:

A bill (No. 344) for the relief of Captain Stanton Sholes;

A bill (No. 575) for the relief of Robert A. Davidge;

A bill (No. 576) for the relief of Douglass Ottinger; and

A bill (No. 446) for the relief of D. O. Dickinson.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the foregoing bills and joint resolutions were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The following Senate bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, were ordered to a third reading; and they were accordingly severally read the third time, and passed:

An act (No. 81) for the relief of Laurent Milaudon;

An act (No. 70) for the relief of John Dick, of Florida;

An act (No. 185) for the relief of Anna M. E. Ring, Louisa M. Ring, Cordelia E. Ring, and Sarah J. De Lannoy;

An act (No. 52) for the relief of William B. Trotter;

An act (No. 59) for the relief of James G. Benton, E. B. Babbitt, and James Longstreet, of the United States Army;

An act (No. 208) for the relief of Fabius Stanley;

An act (No. 92) for the relief of George A. O'Brien;

An act (No. 189) for the relief of Rufus Dwinel; and

An act (No. 67) for the relief of Jonas P. Keller.

Mr. CHAFFEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the foregoing Senate bills were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The following bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House, with amendments, were then taken up and disposed of as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 456) granting an invalid pension to Brevet Major John Jones, of Tennessee; reported with an amendment to strike out, in line six, the words "twenty-five" and insert "forty," so that it shall read, "forty dollars per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BURNETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

An act (S. No. 91) to continue a pension to Christine Barnard, widow of the late Brevet Major Moses J. Barnard, United States Army, reported with an amendment to strike out "thirty," in line five, and insert "twenty-five," so as to make it read "twenty-five dollars per month."

Mr. SINGLETON. I sincerely hope the House will not agree to this amendment. It has passed the Senate in this present shape; and if it is amended, it will have to go back to the Senate, and there will be great danger that it will be lost in the pressure of business. I hope the House will vote down the amendment.

Mr. READY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment to the Senate bill, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, will not be adopted. Out of the large number of private bills which the House has passed to-day, I am sure there is not one more meritorious than this. Mrs. Barnard is the widow of one of the most gallant officers who served in the Mexican war. I happen to have a personal knowledge of her. She is among the most retiring and amiable women I have ever known. Her late husband, Brevet Major Barnard, was twice wounded while heroically attempting to plant the standard of his country on the walls of Chapultepec, of which wound he died about a year afterwards. He left a widow with a family of infant children, one of whom is an only son, and a cripple for life, to be supported and taken care of by his bereaved mother. The only inheritance he left to his family, is poverty, and a reputation honorably, nobly earned in the service of his country. With the heart of a true and lovely woman, she is bowed down with grief, and mourns the loss of that gallant husband as if he had left her but yesterday, while she devotes herself, with a mother's solicitude, to the care and support of her orphan children. Can it be, that such a case will not excite just and generous emotions in the Representatives of this great nation? The Senate bill provides but a reasonable stipend for so meritorious a case, and I trust it will, as it ought to, pass without the reduction proposed by the amendment.

Mr. QUITMAN. As I reported the amendment from the Committee on Military Affairs, it is proper that I should state that that committee had determined to deal justly and equally with all the citizens of the United States; and as the proper pension given in such cases as this was twenty-five dollars per month, we saw no reason why we should discriminate, even in favor of the widow of a brave officer. We were governed by a sense of our duty to the country and not by our sympathy with any individual case.

Mr. SINGLETON. May I be allowed to say one word more?

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to any further discussion.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A bill (H. R. No. 458) for the relief of Evelina Porter, widow of the late Commodore David Porter, of the United States Navy, reported with an amendment to strike out the words "her death," and insert in lieu thereof the words "such intermarriage;" so as to provide that the pension shall cease at the date of her intermarriage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. ELLIOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A bill (C. C. No. 81) for the relief of the heirs of William Turvin, deceased, reported with an amendment to insert "at the rate of $1 25 per acre," so as to make it read "upon any public lands subject to entry or private sale, at the rate of $1 25 per acre."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A bill (H. R. No. 506) for the relief of Horatio Boulton, reported with an amendment to strike out "$515," and to insert, "$588 50."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A bill (H. R. No. 521) increasing the pension of Anthony Walter Bayard, of Bellefonte, in the State of Pennsylvania, reported with an amendment to strike out "twenty," and insert "ten," so that it shall read, "pension at ten dollars per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KELSEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. There are several bills upon which separate votes were asked.

Mr. STANTON. I think those separate votes had better be taken in the morning; and therefore I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon the House (at seven o'clock and thirty-five minutes, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 29, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. D. BALL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the Senate relative to the improvement of the channel of the Potomac river; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented a memorial of E. K. Collins, and associates, praying for the payment of the amount due them under the contract for carrying the mail between New York and Liverpool, with interest; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PAPERS REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Georgiana M. Lewis, widow of Armstrong J. Lewis, be recommended to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. BELL, it was Ordered, That the joint resolution (S. No. 26) for the benefit of the nearest male heir of the late Brigadier General Towson, United States Army, deceased, be recommended to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. POLK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of G. W. Bluford, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 244) for the relief of Henry G. Carson, and the opinion of the Court of Claims adverse to the claim, submitted a report concurring in the decision; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the bill (H. R. No. 254) for the relief of William Hutchinson, and the bill (H. R. No. 334) for the relief of Simeon Stedman, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the report of the Court of Claims adverse to the claim of Arthur Edwards, J. Owen, and J. Davis, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 335) for the relief of Susannah Redman, widow of Lloyd Redman, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 466) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Captain John B. Montgomery, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 418) for the relief of Captain John B. Montgomery. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 203) for the relief of George W. Brisco, reported it without amendment.

NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. HAYNE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the appointment of ten cadets at large to the Naval Academy, by the Executive, as provided with reference to the Military Academy.

LAND DISTRICT IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. STUART. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution, of which I have not given previous notice, for the purpose of correcting an error in a bill that passed a few days ago.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 47) to correct an error in a certain act approved May 11, 1853; which was read a first time, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. STUART. I have a letter which states the error to have been committed in drawing the bill, in the Land Office. I ask for its passage now.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to correct an error in the act approved May 11, 1853, entitled "An act to enlarge the Detroit and Saginaw land district, in the State of Michigan," by extending the limits of that portion of the Cheboygan district which has been attached to the Detroit district, to the lines dividing ranges two and three west, instead of one and two west, the former being the line intended by the Department as the western boundary of the addition to the Detroit district.

Mr. BIGLER. I would suggest to the Senator from Michigan that the resolution, it seems to me, is very peculiar in its terms. Why authorize the Secretary of the Interior to correct the law? Why not make the resolution the law?

Mr. STUART. I noticed that myself; but the proper construction is that it enables him to divide the districts as he wishes.

Mr. BIGLER. Then authorize him to construe the law in that way.

Mr. STUART. Let it be amended so as to say that "the law shall be amended so as to read." I took this language because it was their own.

The Secretary read the resolution as proposed to be amended, as follows:

That an error in an act approved May 11, 1853, entitled "An act to enlarge the Detroit and Saginaw land districts, in the State of Michigan," be corrected, by extending the limits of that portion of the Cheboygan district, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRITISH AGGRESSIONS.

On motion of Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolutions, reported by him yesterday, from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, (as the judgment of the Senate,) That American vessels on the high seas, in time of peace, bearing the American flag, remain under the jurisdiction of the country to which they belong, and, therefore, any visitation, molestation, or detention of such vessels by force, or by the exhibition of force, on the part of a foreign Power, is in derogation of the sovereignty of the United States.

Resolved, That the recent and repeated violations of this immunity, committed by vessels of war belonging to the navy of Great Britain, in the Gulf of Mexico, and the adjacent seas, by firing into, interrupting, and otherwise forcibly detaining them on their voyage, requires, in the judgment of the Senate, such unequivocal and final disposition of the subject, by the Governments of Great Britain and the United States, touching the rights involved, as shall preclude, hereafter, the occurrence of like aggressions.

Resolved, That the Senate fully approves the action of the Executive in sending a naval force into the infested seas with orders "to protect all vessels of the United States on the high seas, from search or detention, by the vessels of war of any other nation." And it is the opinion of the Senate, that, if it becomes necessary, such additional legislation should be supplied in aid of the executive power as will make such protection effectual.

Mr. MASON. It is not my purpose to make a speech on these resolutions. The report accompanying them sets forth the reasons that actuated the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the authorities for the conclusions at which they have arrived. I ask the Senate to consider them immediately, so that by taking the sense of the Senate on the resolutions, whatever aid they may carry may be supplied to the Executive, before whom the question now properly remains in adjustment between the two Governments. The first resolution enunciates, I think very clearly, what the committee understand to be unquestionably the international law between the two Governments, and denies absolutely, for any purpose whatever, the right of visitation, whether accompanied by search or otherwise, by any armed ships, upon merchant vessels under the flag of another nation. The second resolution, after a brief summary of the facts, presents the true issue between the two Governments, as that of the right of visitation. The third resolution states its present posture before the Executive, and the sense of the committee, that, unless when we receive a communication from him hereafter, as to the results of the present correspondence, the national Legislature shall be satisfied that there is no danger of the future recurrence of these aggressions, legislation should be supplied by Congress to enable the public force of the United States to make good our claims.

There can be no question, I think I may confidently say, but that the international law denies absolutely any right of visitation upon the high seas in time of peace. It is a right that has been frequently claimed by foreign nations. I will not say that it has never been disclaimed by Great Britain, with whom we are now brought into apparent collision, but if it has been I am not aware that England has ever disclaimed the right; but she has certainly exercised it in more instances than one on our commerce, as well as that of other nations. The publicists all agree, so far as I have had access to them, that there is no right of visitation on the high seas in time of peace. There is a right which seems to be conceded to a belligerent in a state of war; but that right is confined to the single object of ascertaining whether the vessel visited has on board contraband subjects. Great Britain has extended it, it is true, in her wars, unjustly and against the remonstrance of other Powers, to a right when on board to search for enemies' property; but that has always been denied by other nations. We were led into the war of 1812 by another extension of this claim on the part of Great Britain; which was, that she had a right to go on board, and look for contraband; and being thus rightfully on board, she could look to see if any of her subjects were there, and impress them as seamen.

The report distinctly asserts that there is no right of visitation in peace for any purpose or under any pretext; and that, I believe, the spirit of this nation will make good for the protection of our commerce and for the honor of our flag—should the occasion for it ever unfortunately arise. I do not know that we can look, to satisfy the public mind, to better sources of information upon what is admitted as the law of nations, than into the decisions, upon such questions, properly presented, by the most eminent jurists of this country and of England. I will read, very briefly, from the opinion of the Supreme Court upon this question, in a case directly before it, and decided in 1826. The opinion was delivered by the late Judge Story. It is the case of the Marianna Flora, reported in 11th Wheaton. He says:

"In considering these points, it is necessary to ascertain what are the rights and duties of armed and other ships, navigating the ocean in time of peace."

This was the case of the capture of an armed ship belonging to the Portuguese, by an armed ship of the United States, under circumstances which will be stated:

"It is admitted that the right of visitation and search does not, under such circumstances, belong to the public ships of any nation. This right is strictly a belligerent right, allowed by the general consent of nations in time of war, and limited to those occasions. It is true that it has been held in the courts of this country that American ships, offending against our laws, and foreign ships, in like manner offending within our jurisdiction, may, afterwards, be pursued and seized on the ocean, and rightfully brought into our ports for adjudication. This, however, has never been supposed to draw after it any right of visitation or search. The party, in such case, seizes at his peril. If he establishes the forfeiture, he is justified; if he fails, he must make full compensation in damages."

That is where an armed ship, under authority of law, pursues a vessel of our own country for breach of the laws of the country, or pursues a foreign ship leaving our ports which has committed a like breach:

"Upon the ocean, then, in time of peace, all possess an entire equality. It is the common highway of all, appropriated to the use of all; and no one can vindicate to himself a superior or exclusive prerogative there. Every ship sails there with the unquestionable right of pursuing her own lawful business without interruption; but whatever may be that business, she is bound to pursue it in such a manner as not to violate the rights of others. The general maxim in such cases is, sic utere tuo, ut non alienum laedas."

Again:

"Every vessel undoubtedly has a right to the use of so much of the ocean as she occupies, and as is essential to her own movements. Beyond this, no exclusive right has ever yet been recognized, and we see no reason for admitting its existence. Merchant ships are in the constant habit of approaching each other on the ocean, either to relieve their own distress, to procure information, or to ascertain the character of strangers; and, hitherto, there has never been supposed in such conduct any breach of the customary observances, or of the strictest principles of the law of nations. In respect to ships of war sailing, as in the present case, under the authority of their Governments, to arrest pirates and other public offenders, there is no reason why they may not approach any vessels despatched at sea, for the purpose of ascertaining their real characters. Such a right seems indispensable for the fair and discreet exercise of their authority; and the use of it cannot be justly deemed indicative of any design to insult or injure those they approach, or to impede them in their lawful commerce. On the other hand, it is as clear that no ship is, under such circumstances, bound to lie by, or wait the approach of any other ship. She is at full liberty to pursue her voyage in her own way, and to use all necessary precaution to avoid any suspected sinister enterprise or hostile attack. She has a right to consult her own safety; but, at the same time, she must take care not to violate the rights of others. She may use any precautions dictated by the prudence or fears of her officers; either as to delay, or the progress or course of her voyage; but she is not at liberty to inflict injuries upon other innocent parties, simply because of conjectural dangers. These principles seem to us the natural result of the common duties and rights of nations navigating the ocean in time of peace."

There is a distinct disclaimer on the part of any public ship, in time of peace, to do more than approach and reconnoiter. There is a distinct denial of the right of an armed ship of any nation to interrupt, far less to board or to visit for any purpose, a ship of another nation under its flag on the high seas, in time of peace, and with the distinct declaration that the ship pursued or intended to be visited is not bound to lie by or to wait, which, I suppose, would exclude any idea of the right of visitation.

I will read a few extracts more from the decision of a very eminent English admiralty jurist, Sir

William Scott, (Lord Stowell,) in the case of the Le Louis, which I have also referred to in the report. This was a case of the visitation and search of a French ship, supposed to be engaged in the slave trade, in 1817, by a British armed vessel, sought to be justified under an act of the British Parliament, passed in the reign of George III.; and the judge, in speaking of the authority, declared, in terms which distinguished the legal and discriminating mind of that great jurist, that no British statute, intended to affect the rights of other nations, or the citizens or subjects of other nations, had any validity on the high seas, if it was in contravention of the public law; and upon this question of visitation he says:

"Upon the first question, whether the right of search exists in time of peace, I have to observe that two principles of public law are generally recognized as fundamental. One is the perfect equality and entire independence of all distinct States. Relative magnitude creates no distinction of right; relative imbecility, whether permanent or casual, gives no additional right to the more powerful neighbor; and any advantage seized upon that ground is mere usurpation. This is the great foundation of public law, which it mainly concerns the peace of mankind, both in their politic and private capacities, to preserve inviolate. The second is, that all nations being equal, all have an equal right to the uninterrupted use of the unappropriated parts of the ocean for their navigation. In places where no local authority exists, where the subjects of all States meet upon a footing of entire equality and independence, no one State, or any of its subjects, has a right to assume or exercise authority over the subjects of another. I can find no authority that gives the right of interruption to the navigation of States in amity upon the high seas, excepting that which the rights of war give to both belligerents against neutrals."

Again:

"But at present, under the law, as now generally understood and practiced, no nation can exercise a right of visitation and search upon the common and unappropriated parts of the sea, save only on the belligerent claim. If it be asked why the right of search does not exist in time of peace as well as in war, the answer is prompt: that it has not the same foundation on which alone it is tolerated in war—the necessities of self-defense. They introduced it in war, and practice has established it. No such necessities have introduced it in time of peace, and no such practice has established it."

I will say nothing more on the question of law. The public mind of the country, and, I doubt not, the mind of both Houses of Congress, is satisfied on that. Then as to the policy of the resolutions, they indicate nothing more than that the time has arrived, most unfortunately impressed on us by the late occurrences in the Gulf of Mexico, of a very peculiar and remarkable character. I say it is most impressively fixed on our mind that the time has arrived when this question must be settled, and settled forever. I trust it may be done through the intervention of the executive power, in the correspondence which is pending between the two countries. There is every reason why it should be, and none why it should not be. But even if it did not lead to war, the constant state of irritation, angry feeling, and disposition to re-criminate or make reprisals, would necessarily bring the two countries into collision in some way. Whether that occurred or not, I say again, the character of the offenses that have been committed are such as would so effectually arouse the most indignant feeling of the American people, that with every restraining power that Congress might exercise, it would be impossible to keep the two countries from getting into a collision on the sea on account of these acts.

At the time the report was made, the number of cases that had occurred were comparatively few. Every arrival from those seas brings to us instances of new aggressions, and some of them committed—and they are alluded to in the report, as is there stated—almost, if not actually in sight of the American coast. One was the case of a coasting vessel, owned, I think, in New York, a regular trader, bound on a domestic voyage from Mobile to New York, with a cargo of cotton, and she was fired into and actually struck, until she lay to and enabled the visiting officer to come on board. Another, equally strong, was the case of an American vessel returning home from a distant voyage to some port in Europe, which, between the Florida capes and the Island of Cuba, was in like manner fired into and arrested upon her homeward voyage, almost in sight of land. I know it will be impossible to avoid a collision, and a collision that must result in the abandonment of this right on the part of the American people, or in making it good, unless the question be now settled, and definitively settled, between the two countries.

Mr. MALLORY. I send an amendment to the Chair, which I ask to be read, as a substitute for the second resolution.

The Secretary read the amendment, which is to strike out all after the word "resolved," in the second resolution, and insert:

That the recent proceedings of British naval officers in the Gulf of Mexico, upon the high seas, in forcibly arresting and examining vessels of the United States, owned and navigated by American citizens, engaged in lawful trade, are without justification or palliation, in derogation of the cherished rights of the American people, which they can neither surrender nor suffer to be infringed with honor; and that the President of the United States be authorized to adopt immediate measures to arrest at once a continuance of such indignities.

Mr. MALLORY. I am rejoiced to see the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, but, with due respect to the committee, I should like to see the resolutions amended somewhat in this way: so as to be a little more vigorous in their character. The time has arrived, in my judgment, for some action. If we have correct accounts, already twenty-seven of our vessels, owned and navigated by American citizens, engaged in lawful trade, have been fired upon, forcibly arrested, illegally detained, and searched by British cruisers, by naval officers, performing the duty of special constables upon the deep; and if we are to believe the accounts we receive from some of those whose vessels have thus been taken from their custody, and, for a time at least, held under British power, they have inflicted this national outrage, which is destitute of justification or palliation, with less personal civility than has distinguished many of Britain's fabled highway robbers or roadside thieves.

I say, sir, these proceedings are without justification or palliation, and I hope the Senate will so declare, for I know that there can be no man in this high forum who will not at once plant his heel upon the paltry pretext that they are the appropriate means of verifying our flag.

If this authority over our flag upon the sea, were sought to be enforced now for the first time, it could not fail to arouse our indignant resistance; but enforced as it is against the common sentiment of civilized States, against the stern remonstrances and known convictions and policy of this country, and enforced, too, near our own shore within a sea peculiarly American, in which our commerce exceeds that of the united world, it does seem to me, sir, that we should meet and crush it with something more potent than a diplomatic expression of the earnest desire of the Executive.

Sir, if the onward march of this great Republic is to be stayed to find arguments to meet this insolent aggression, we can find none more just or potent than those furnished by the judicial tribunals of the aggressor herself. The language of Lord Stowell, as bright a luminary of civil jurisprudence as England ever had, may as appropriately be addressed to the British Ministry to-day, with reference to these searches, as it was to the British captors of the French ship Le Louis, to which the report before us refers. But the strongest points in the case of the Le Louis, decided by Lord Stowell, (previously Sir William Scott,) have not been read by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He laid down, in 1817, unequivocally—and the British courts were slow in coming to this conclusion—that this pretended right of visitation, which is nothing more than the right of search in its broadest sense, cannot be exercised in time of peace; that it is a belligerent right alone, incompatible with peaceful measures.

Let me read his very words:

"Upon the first question, whether the right of search exists in time of peace, I have to observe, that two principles of public law are generally recognized as fundamental. One is the perfect equality and entire independence of all distinct States. Relative magnitude creates no distinction of right; relative imbecility, whether permanent or casual, gives no additional right to the more powerful neighbor; and any advantage seized upon that ground is mere usurpation. This is the great foundation of public law, which it mainly concerns the peace of mankind, both in their politic and private capacities, to preserve inviolate. The second is, that all nations being equal, all have an equal right to the uninterrupted use of the unappropriated parts of the ocean for their navigation. In places where no local authority exists, where the subjects of all States meet upon a footing of entire equality and independence, no one State, or any of its subjects, has a right to assume, or exercise authority over the subjects of another. I can find no authority that gives the right of interruption to the navigation of States in amity upon the high seas, excepting that which the rights of war give to both belligerents against neutrals."—The Le Louis, 2 Dodson's Admiralty Reports, page 243.

Again:

"But at present, under the law, as now generally understood and practiced, no nation can exercise a right of visitation and search upon the common and unappropriated parts of the sea, save only on the belligerent claim. If it be asked why the right of search does not exist in time of peace as well as in war, the answer is prompt: that it has not the same foundation on which alone it is tolerated in war—the necessities of self-defense. They introduced it in war, and practice has established it."

He gives an instance where Britain herself resisted such a claim:

"A recent Swedish claim of examination on the high seas, though confined to foreign ships bound to Swedish ports, and accompanied in a manner not very consistent or intelligible, with a disclaimer of all right of visitation, was resisted by our Government as unlawful, and was finally withdrawn."

He disposes of some of the grounds on which the claim was rested:

"It is next said that every country has a right to enforce its own navigation laws; and so it certainly has, so far as it does not interfere with the rights of others. It has a right to see that its own vessels are duly navigated, but it has no right in consequence to visit and search all the apparent vessels of other countries on the high seas, in order to institute an inquiry whether they are not in truth British vessels violating British laws. No such right has ever been claimed, nor can it be exercised, without the oppression of interrupting and harassing the real and lawful navigation of other countries; for the right of search when it exists at all, is universal, and will extend to vessels of all countries."

"It is no objection to say that British ships may thus, by disguise, elude the obligations of British law. The answer of the foreigner is ready, that you have no right to provide against the inconvenience, by imposing a burden upon his navigation. If the question were even reduced to this, that either all British ships might fraudulently escape, or all foreign ships be injuriously harassed, Great Britain could not claim the option to embrace the latter branch of the alternative. When you complain that the regulation cannot be enforced without the exercise of such a right, the answer again is, that you ought not to make regulations which you cannot enforce without trespassing on the rights of others. If it were a matter by which your own safety was affected, the necessities of self-defense would fully justify; but in a matter in which your own safety is in no degree concerned, you have no right to prevent a suspected injustice towards another, by committing an actual injustice of your own."

In reference to the alleged object—the suppression of the slave trade—he declares:

"To every man it must have been evident that, without a general and sincere concurrence of all the maritime States the principle and in the proper modes of pursuing it, comparatively but little of positive good could be acquired; so far, at least, as the interests of the victims of this commerce were concerned in it; and to every man who looks to the rival claims of these States, to the established habits of trade, to their real or pretended wants, to their different modes of thinking, and to their real mode of acting upon this particular subject, it must be equally evident that such a concurrence was matter of very difficult attainment. But the difficulty of the attainment will not legalize measures that are otherwise illegal. To press forward to a great principle by breaking through every other great principle that stands in the way of its establishment; to force the way to the liberation of Africa by trampling on the independence of other States in Europe; in short, to procure an eminent good by means that are unlawful, is as little consonant to private morality as to public justice."

"If I felt it necessary to press the consideration further, it would be by stating the gigantic mischiefs which such a claim is likely to produce. It is no secret, particularly in this place, that the right of search in time of war, though unquestionable, is not submitted to without complaints loud and bitter, in spite of all the modifications that can be applied to it."

"But to establish the consequence required, it is first necessary to establish the right to interpose by force to prevent the commission of crime, commences, not upon the commencement of the overt act, nor upon the evident approach towards it; but on the bare surmise grounded on the mere possibility; for unless it goes that length it will not support the right of forcible inquiry and search. What are the proximate circumstances which confer on you the right of intruding yourself into a foreign ship, over which you have no authority whatever, or of demanding the submission of its crew to your inquiry whether they mean to deal in the traffic of slaves, not in our country, but in one in which you have no connection?"

Mr. Webster in his celebrated discussion on this point, soon after the negotiation of the Ashburton treaty, takes the same ground, and he unequivocally establishes, in my judgment, the fact that all the publicists who had written on the subject used, the words visit and visitation, where they are used, so as to imply the broadest and most unlimited right of search. Mr. Webster, too, in writing to General Cass, who put forth a document in 1841, on this very subject, in Paris, approves it entirely, and instructs him that the Executive approved everything he said in that pamphlet. It will be recollected that Great Britain did not pretend to exercise this alleged right in time of peace, and she sought privilege from the Powers of Europe to exercise it over their vessels. Hence, in 1833, she negotiated a treaty with France to permit her to examine French vessels in order that they might guard against the slave trade. France has always been jealous of Britain's power on the deep, and she refused to concede it except in certain specified latitudes. In 1841, Great Britain sought to enlarge these latitudes, that she might have an unlimited right of search; she sought to include in that right other Powers, and the quintuple treaty was negotiated. It was then that General Cass stepped forward, and by unanswerable argument showed the French people what the right of search was, and by his interposition the French Minister, Guizot, and Louis Philippe, who had negotiated this treaty, refused to ratify it, and it was not ratified, and they have no right this day to search the French vessels on the deep.

It is very remarkable, sir, too, that the exercise of this right, for the first time since the last war, on a general scale, except in occasional and isolated instances, should have immediately followed the refusal of this Government to entertain certain propositions on the slave question. We cannot solace ourselves with the reflection that this right is being exercised by indiscreet naval officers, that they are pushing their rights to an extreme. It is not thus that Britain's naval officers ever perform their duty. They have their instructions from the admiral at Jamaica, and he has his instructions from the home Government, and under those instructions they are acting now.

It is to meet it here, that I am disposed to use a little more vigor. I am fully aware of the responsibility of taking any active measures to redress it. The true interests of our country, and of our race, equally point to ours as a mission of peace on earth. They equally declare to the Governments of the world—and we have so declared our policy—that war with us is an ultimatum, and that war should be the last resort for injured wrongs. Calamitous at all times as war is, a contest between Great Britain and our country, freighted as they are with the liberties and hopes of mankind; united by ties more precious than those which connect any two nations of the earth; equally cherishing the language of Shakespeare, the liberties of Magna Charta, and the religion of Christ, would present a struggle whose consequences could neither be foreshadowed nor estimated. And yet, sir, I would brave all the known, all the imaginary evils of such a contest, and make every sacrifice consistent with honor to maintain it, rather than see my country tamely submit to this insolent outrage upon her national honor. I would brave them all, sir, because a tame submission to such humiliation would be more perilous to our future than would the issue of a hundred battles. I feel it, and for that reason I am desirous to see more vigorous councils.

Mr. Webster, discussing the question of this pretended right to verify our flag, set up by Great Britain, asks:

"But if the vessel thus approached attempts to avoid the vessel approaching, or does not comply with her commander's order to send him her papers for inspection, nor consent to be visited or detained, what is next to be done? Is force to be used? And if force be used, may that force be lawfully repelled? These questions lead at once to the elementary principle, the essence of the British claim. Suppose the merchant vessel be in truth an American vessel engaged in lawful commerce, and that she does not choose to be detained—suppose she resists the visit: what is the consequence? In all cases in which the belligerent right of visit exists, resistance to the exercise of that right is regarded as just cause of condemnation, both of vessel and cargo. Is that penalty, or what other penalty, to be incurred by resistance to visit in time of peace? Or suppose that force be met by force, gun returned for gun, and the commander of the cruiser, or some of his seamen, be killed: what description of offense will have been committed?"

In the letter to General Cass to which I have alluded, in discussing the general question, Mr. Webster says:

"The Government of the United States, on the other hand, maintains that there is no such well-known and acknowledged, nor, indeed, any broad and generic difference between what has been usually called 'visit,' and what has been usually called 'search'; that the right of visit, to be effectual, must come, in the end, to include search; and thus to exercise in peace, an authority which the law of nations only allows in times of war. If such well-known distinction exists, where are the proofs of it? What writers of authority on public law, what adjudication in courts of admiralty, what public treaties, recognize it? No such recognition has presented itself to the Government of the United States; but, on the contrary, it understands that public writers, courts of law, and solemn treaties have, for two centuries, used the words 'visit' and 'search' in the same sense. What Great Britain and the United States mean by the 'right of search,' in its broadest sense, is called by continental writers and jurists by no other name than the 'right of visit.' Visit, therefore, as it has been understood, implies not only a right to inquire into the national character, but to detain the vessel, to stop the progress of the voyage, to examine papers, to decide on their regularity and authenticity, and to make inquiry on board for enemies' property, and into the business in which the vessel is engaged. In other words, it prescribes the entire right of belligerent visitation and search."

"On the whole, the Government of the United States, while it has not conceded a mutual right of visit or search, as has been done by the parties to the quintuple treaty of December, 1841, does not admit that, by the law and practice of nations, there is any such thing as a right of visit, distinguished by well-known rules and definitions from the right of search."

"The President directs me to say that he approves your letter, and warmly commends the motives which animated you in presenting it. The whole subject is now before us here, or will be shortly, as Lord Ashburton arrived last evening; and without intending to intimate at present what mode of settling this point of difference with England will be proposed, you may receive two propositions as certain:

1st. That, in the absence of treaty stipulations, the United States will maintain the immunity of merchant vessels on the seas to the fullest extent which the law of nations authorizes."

Without detaining the Senate further on the argument of Mr. Webster and the argument of Lord Stowell, on the subject of difference between the right of search and the right of visit, I will simply say that Lord Stowell was brought to his conclusion from a regular gradation of decisions. In 1807, Sir William Grant decided the case of the Amitie, which was a Portuguese vessel, if I remember rightly, and justified the right of search, the slave trade being contrary to the laws of Great Britain. That was followed by the Diana and by the Fortuna, and in the first case Lord Stowell conceded the right, and felt himself bound by the higher court and the decision of the Amitie; but in 1817, no longer able to maintain his position against the voice of civilized States, he totally disregarded that, and expressly says in this very decision (omitted by the Committee on Foreign Relations) that the right of visit is a belligerent right; and the language which he addressed to the British captors of the Le Louis, might very well to-day be addressed to the Ministers of Great Britain. He asked them to put their finger on the law which authorized them to step on board a foreign vessel. He informed them that France has her rights, and if her laws have been invaded it is for her to right herself, and that she has delegated no such power to England.

I rejoice, sir, that the Secretary of the Navy has so promptly responded to the general sentiment of the country, in sending all the disposable force at his command to the Gulf of Mexico. The order was simply to protect American vessels. No British cruiser would, in the presence of an American man-of-war, attempt to pursue this right of search. They could very easily avoid it without surrendering that principle. They would say at once, "the fact that you are here in the presence of your merchant vessel, is guarantee that she prima facie is an American vessel, and our vocation will not be pursued." That will be the policy. They will search none while we have a fleet there. But, if our Government had given orders to one of our ships to ascertain who had fired into the American vessel, and bring the offending ship into port, we should have got something like a tangible position on this question.

I rejoice, too, that we have found no want of alacrity in our Navy. Nearly every man in it—and I believe every man—has volunteered for the service; and the only regret is, that we have found ourselves, in our home ports—from the failure of Congress to provide a Navy—without such ships as the public weal demands on this occasion, and that we have had to fit out very inferior vessels; indeed, almost ridiculous in their force to go to right a wrong of this character.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have read this report with some care. Since it was made, I have examined the authorities to which it refers; and, before the question is put on the amendment of the honorable Senator from Florida, I propose to amend the resolution which he moves to strike out. I will read it as I propose to amend it:

Resolved, That the recent and repeated violations of this immunity committed by vessels of war belonging to the Navy of Great Britain, in the Gulf of Mexico and the adjacent seas, by firing into, interrupting, and otherwise forcibly detaining them on their voyage, are belligerent in their character, and should be resisted at all hazards by all the power of the country.

Nineteen years ago, sir, about this time, a citizen of Maine, sent by the authorities of Maine to a territory which was in dispute between this country and Great Britain, was made a prisoner.

He was not used very severely. I believe he was carried down to one of the British towns and made the guest of the Governor, and let go on his parole. But when that fact was known to Congress, (and I believe Congress was on the eve of adjournment,) they immediately passed an act placing the whole naval and military power of the Union at the command of the President; gave him authority to finish all the national ships that were in construction, and build other ships and other steamboats; to call forth all the militia of the country, and to accept the services of fifty thousand volunteers, in addition to $10,000,000 of money put at his disposal. That was the response which Congress gave nineteen years ago, when a single man was formally arrested on the disputed territory between this country and Great Britain.

Now, sir, if the report of the committee is to be relied upon—and I have not the slightest question that it is—that, in connection with subsequent facts, shows that here is not a single but a continuous series of repeated aggressions upon our commerce in derogation of the public law, as decided by the highest judicial tribunals of this country and of Great Britain. What does such a case as that ask—argument? Does it want any action on the part of the Government of Great Britain? They have had their action; and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs tells us—no doubt correctly—that these acts are committed by order of the admiral and commander of the fleet, and that he is acting by order of the home Government. If that is so, there is but one course for us to take. The time for argument has gone by. I never thought much of that man's courage who, when his hat was knocked off, asked the man that did it if he meant to insult him, or threatened if he did it the second or third time he would resist it. No, sir; I think this matter has been discussed long enough; and, if the facts of the committee be correct, and the reasoning sound, as I believe they are, this Government ought to take a decided position, and they ought to call these acts what they are. The resolution says that these acts—

“Require, in the judgment of the Senate, such unequivocal and final disposition of the subject by the Governments of Great Britain and the United States.”

No, sir; it is not a case for the action of the Government of Great Britain. It is a case for the action of this Government. Our commerce has been invaded over and over again; the act is persisted in, and is done by authority of the British Government. I do not think we had better ask them whether they are ready to apologize, but we had better put ourselves in a position for them to ask us to apologize. They have commenced acts of war upon the commerce of this country, and they have repeated them and continued them. Our judicial tribunals say such an act is war; the judicial tribunals of England say it is war. They understand it, and we understand it; and I say the only position this country can take with dignity or with honor, is to treat it as an act of war, and to meet it as such, force with force. That will bring it to an issue. Then there will be a settlement; then there will be a negotiation; and then we shall know, for all coming time, whether this right of search is ever to be insisted upon again by the Government of Great Britain.

I am a man of peace; and I should look upon a war between this country and Great Britain as one of the greatest calamities that could befall the civilized world; but, sir, I should look on the lowering of our national dignity, and our submitting to such an assumption as this on the seas by Great Britain, as a greater calamity than war itself; because it would be a tame surrender of the rights that were bought by blood, and have come to us by inheritance. I think the way to maintain peace, and to maintain our rights inviolate, is to let Great Britain know that upon this subject we have no argument to make; we have no remonstrances to utter: “Your officials have committed acts of war upon our commerce, and as such we meet them.” Then if they disavow them, very well; but if they avow them, and they are the acts of the Government, as no doubt is the case, they should be met by action of this Government, and not by remonstrance. For that reason, and for the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate, I simply ask the Senate to declare what every man knows to be true, that these acts are belligerent in their character. If they are belligerent in their character, I think the latter part of the proposition follows as a corollary that belligerent acts should be resisted by the power, and not refuted by the logic of the country. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would inquire of the Senator from Florida if his amendment was intended in lieu of the second resolution?

MR. MALLORY. Yes, sir.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire proposes first to amend the second resolution, after the word “voyage,” by striking out:

“Requires, in the judgment of the Senate, such unequivocal and final disposition of the subject by the Governments of Great Britain and the United States, touching the rights involved, as shall preclude hereafter the occurrence of like aggressions;”

and inserting in lieu thereof:

Are belligerent in their character, and should be resisted at all hazards and by all the power of the country.

MR. MALLORY. I withdraw the amendment I offered, with the permission of the Senate, and prefer the one the Senator from New Hampshire has offered. I supposed the resolution was a joint one; I see it is not. It amounts to nothing but an expression of opinion.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to withdraw his amendment, no action having been taken. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

MR. TOOMBS. It is not my purpose to argue the right of any nation to visit or to search American ships in time of peace. I consider that argument to have been exhausted; that question to have been settled for the last forty years by the American people. It was one of the causes of the last war with England. It was not settled at the treaty of Ghent; but it was there given to be distinctly understood by the American negotiators, and it has been uniformly affirmed by this Government, that whenever exercised, we should consider it a belligerent act. Therefore, there is but one point in this case: if these belligerent acts of search have been done by the authority of the British Government, they are acts of war that ought to be resisted by force; and we want no measures of prevention in the future, but redress for the insult in the past. We want something more than the resolutions of the committee offer to give us here. We want something more than pledges or securities that belligerent acts will not be committed against us in the future. We want satisfaction for the committal of these acts, if they have been done by the authority of the British Government, and that is the only question I wish to know. If they have been done by authority of the British Government, they are acts of war that we ought to resist by force, and resist now. If they have been done without their authority, we ought to seize these vessels, to prevent the performance of those acts, not only against the laws of nations, but against our rights, and against the authority of their own Government.

Therefore, I shall vote for a resolution that will not only send our Navy there to prevent the continuance of this war upon our commerce, but will seize the vessels which have committed these hostilities, with or without the authority of the British Government. That Government is too far off. We cannot afford to have our houses searched while waiting to hear what they say. It is not allowable, I believe, for the humblest man in Great Britain or in this country, to have his house searched, even with a general warrant. The British resisted that a hundred years ago. Our Constitution protects us against it. We are free from it by our own Constitution except under the most stringent circumstances; but Great Britain, a foreign Government, without any pretense, without any forms of law, claims the right of disgracing our flag, and searching our vessels in the Gulf of Mexico at our own doors. Will you send across the water, and have negotiation while these things are going on? Every gale that wafts a sail from the Gulf of Mexico, brings here accounts of new wrongs and new outrages; and I suppose we must send to England to know if she warrants the acts of this fleet who are roving over the seas, free rovers, violating our declared rights that we have stood by for forty years, to know whether it is by the authority of their masters! The military force of the country should be sent to the Gulf, and it should seize or sink the aggressors, and get an explanation afterwards. If it is against their orders, we have treated them right; if it is not against their orders, we have treated England right; so that, in any event, I shall vote for that measure which will seize the British aggressors on our rights and bring them to our ports for condign punishment, and I shall be satisfied with nothing short of it.

MR. SEWARD. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to go into this debate further than to express with distinctness my entire concurrence in the general tone and sentiment which is pervading the Senate and the Congress and the country, in regard to these outrages upon our commerce in the Gulf of Mexico. I believe the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has already stated that, in regard to this transaction, the Committee on Foreign Relations are unanimous. I wish, on behalf of the minority of the committee, to make a direct announcement of the concurrence of the minority with the majority in the resolutions which were adopted, and in the spirit which dictated them. It is a labor of criticism altogether, as it seems to me, to debate, at this time, the supposed difference between a right of naval visitation or naval search. I need no laws, I need no judicial decisions to instruct my mind upon the rights of nations on the great highway of nations. According to the theory which I have adopted, a nation is a moral person, an individual, and all nations are equal moral persons or individuals, and entitled to the same political rights. The ocean is the highway of nations. If it be right because there are thieves and robbers occasionally in the streets of Washington, that I should be arrested, stopped, and detained by any passer-by who may choose to suspect me of being a culprit, and that I am obliged to stop on my way and to give explanations and submit to be searched at the pleasure of every person who may choose to exercise this right of police over me, then it is true that one nation has the right to constitute itself a police upon the seas for the purpose of ascertaining the honesty and integrity and good conduct of another nation upon the seas. There is, sir, no such authority anywhere, either in domestic law, or in public or national law. I believe that this is a pretension which is set up by the British Government alone; and no other nation ever set it up unless it was some nation that, like Great Britain, aimed openly to exercise a mastery over the seas; and that it is a claim founded in force or in power, and not at all in right. If Great Britain has chosen heretofore to assert this right against us and other States, it was because she thought she had power to enforce it, and because she expected to derive great and exclusive advantages from it. She has, indeed, exercised it over other Powers. She has attempted to exercise it against the United States. But the United States set out with the determination to be an equal on the seas, as well as on land, with every other nation; and we have never recognized this pretension of Great Britain, and never will; and my judgment is that it has been practically abandoned by the British Government for the last forty years, or ever since the close of the war in which the right was asserted by Great Britain. It cannot be maintained.

Nor can it be maintained even in the modified form in which it is now asserted on the part of the British Government by some of their authors, and by some of their diplomatists. As I understand that matter, the same pretense or claim which in this country we call the right of search, in Europe is generally called the right of visitation, or right of visit; one nation calls it search, another calls it visit; but the terms are synonymous. In Europe, by the right of visit they mean the right to search; and in America, by denying the right of search we also deny the right of visitation, or of visit.

What is the true principle, probably, in the intercourse of nations, is this: that as there may be pirates upon the seas, as there may be culprits abroad in our avenues and streets, any person who, upon cause which he thinks sufficient, shall choose to challenge another as an unsafe and dangerous person, may seize, arrest, and detain him; but he does it at his peril. If the person arrested as a culprit proves to be such, he is abandoned to the justice against which he has offended. But if he turns out to be an innocent party, the person who has arrested him is an aggressor, and must respond in damages to the satisfaction of the party aggrieved. This is no right at all. It is no law at all. It is the practical intercourse between nations, regulated by dictates of common prudence and common justice. This Government would never manifest any sensibility on account of a person, whether a citizen of this country or a foreigner, who should prostitute its flag to the purpose of piracy; but it must manifest its indignation, its determination to punish and to repress an aggression upon honest merchants, honest traders, honest citizens, who are molested under an injurious suspicion of being offenders upon the high seas. Therefore it is that, for twenty years past, I have never looked into a law book to ascertain the law in regard to this subject. It is enough that the claim debated cannot be permitted. It is enough that it would destroy the equality of nations. It is enough that it is a claim on the part of another Power to exercise vigilance and supervision over the conduct of this nation.

I have no particular concern whether the precise resolutions which have been reported by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations shall be adopted, or some others which shall be equivalent. The committee consists of seven members; and upon a question of this kind there would naturally be some difference of opinion among the seven, and some difference of taste. What was arrived at was a result which was substantially satisfactory, I believe, to us all. Each of us, I believe, is prepared to adopt any other expression which shall be proposed to us which shall combine two qualities: the one which shall manifest greater decision and energy, and determination to accept of no compromise, to submit to no continuance of these outrages, and to repel and put down and extinguish forever the pretension out of which they have arisen; the other, that dignity and moderation which become a great nation in the expression of its opinions on a great question. It is entirely immaterial to me whether the resolutions which have been reported by the committee find favor with the Senate, or whether those which are supposed to be more energetic and vigorous, which are proposed by some gentlemen who have offered amendments, shall be preferred. It is seen that the case has already gone as far as, under the circumstances, it could be carried by any independent action which the Senate only could adopt.

In the first place, there has been no opportunity for us to learn how it happened that these transactions have occurred. All prudent and reasonable men, I believe, agree that it is absurd to suppose that the British Government itself has ordered and directed these proceedings in the Gulf of Mexico with a knowledge and intention of the extent to which they were to be carried, because it is an act of aggression and of war; and we have all good reason to believe that if Great Britain had any quarrel with the United States, and wanted to make war, she would not begin it with a gunboat in molesting our vessels in the Gulf of Mexico. We have no reason to believe that any such proceeding would have been adopted, unless there had been some previous complaint, or at least some hostile demonstration made. We suppose, therefore, that it is possible the officers who have committed these outrages may have transcended their orders, or that the orders may have originated in some blunder or error. However that may be, it was the purpose of the committee, and we agree with the Senators who have spoken, not to submit, and not to wait for explanations or apologies; not to intimate that any apology or explanation can be made which will be satisfactory to us for what has been done. We propose, that without waiting at all, the proceedings themselves shall be met with the force necessary to resist and suppress, and so shall compel a discontinuance of them. For that purpose the resolution which I offered some days ago was submitted to the Senate, which resolution directed the Committee on Foreign Relations to inquire whether any additional legislation was necessary. This report brings in the fact ascertained by the committee, in obedience to that resolution, that the President of the United States has already sent into the Gulf of Mexico all the available naval forces of the United States, enough to sink all the gun-boats and all the vessels the British Government have there, and that they have instructions to execute the determination of this Government by suppressing this nuisance and terminating it at once. Whether more than that is necessary, is for the consideration of the Senate. The resolutions pledge the support of the Senate to the President in executing this purpose which he has already adopted, and also seeks to obtain a pledge of Congress that if it shall turn out that further legislation is necessary to provide means for war, it shall be promptly given.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I do not propose, at this time, to go into a discussion of this question. If we had before us a measure of practical legislation, proposing to confer power to carry out the opinions which we express here, I should feel disposed to make a brief speech on the subject. I hardly know what the Senator from New York means by saying that the minority of the committee concur with the majority in the report and resolutions which have been brought in. I do not know to whom that term applies. It may be a political designation; and, if so, he will find in the committee at least three divisions.

I concurred in the committee in the general tone of the report. I made but one reservation then, and I make but one now, in expressing that concurrence. My reservation is, that instead of contenting ourselves with the expression of opinions that these outrages must stop, we should bring forward practical legislation to authorize the President to put an end to them. I see no use in resolving on the subject. We resolved forty years ago that we would not submit to the right of search. England has been informed again and again, as firmly and as solemnly as it is in the power of any people to inform another, that this invasion of our rights must cease; and that, if it do not, we will repel it by force. I do not see the necessity of re-resolving that she must not do it over again. She has violated the sanctity of the American flag, according to the information we have, thirty-three times within four weeks; and we are to tell her that, if she continues to do it, we shall not like it. I suppose she knows now that we do not like it. We fought her upon it more than forty years ago. We have affirmed ever since that we would not submit to it. What good will it do now to resolve again that her course in this respect is a violation of our rights; that the American people look upon it as a belligerent act; that it is offensive to us; and that we will not submit to it? I think there is a more direct way of coming at the question. Clothe the President with power to put an end to this course of proceeding; and then, when our rights are again violated, let him instantly avenge the wrong on the spot.

It is said that the Executive has now exerted the whole power of the Government, by ordering all our disposable naval force into the infested seas, with instructions to protect the American flag and the property and citizens under it. I commend and admire the promptness with which the President has exercised this power, but is it sufficient to be effectual? It seems to be understood, although I am not prepared to concur in the opinion, that his power extends simply to the point of preventing a search while the act is being done. Have you force enough in the Gulf to do that? Can you have force enough there to prevent the act? You will be under the necessity of sending one war ship by the side of each merchantman, so that it may be constantly present in order to prevent it. Do you suppose that you are ever going to get an opportunity to prevent the act being done at the time? They will only make the search when the American war ship is not present. Suppose one of our ships of war should be along side the Styx when she was about to search an American vessel: undoubtedly the Englishman would say, "I am not going to search this merchantman; I will only do it in the absence of an American man-of-war; but you being here, you may search yourself to see whether she is a pirate or a slave." They will never do the act when there is an American ship present to resist it; and the moment the American ship is out of sight, they will make the search, fire a gun across the bow, a gun across the stern, then into the rigging, and then into the ship until they bring her to, and she submits to an inspection and such delay and search as the British officer may require. The Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] thinks we have naval force enough there to sink all the gun-boats and ships of war the English have in the Gulf of Mexico and the West Indies. If he will compare the statistics, he will find that the British have there now three guns to our one, even after our whole disposable force shall have arrived there. You may make your calculation of every gun we have there, and every disposable gun we have under orders to go there, and when all are counted, the British have three to our one. It is idle to suppose, at least it is very brave to suppose, that our one ship is going to sink their three, and be present by the side of every merchant ship we have, for the purpose of repelling an assault. I think our force there is utterly inadequate if it is to be used only in repelling assault, pending the perpetration of the act.

It strikes me that there is another mode of proceeding, and that is to allow a ship of war to get on to the track of the Styx, or the Buzzard, or the Forward, or any English vessel that has been committing these outrages; follow and capture her, and bring her into an American port, and that will be a good time to negotiate. I think it is time to look to the offending ship for redress, instead of remonstrating with the British Government. We have protested, we have remonstrated long enough. If these outrages be continued, follow the ship and capture her and the officers, and make all persons on board prisoners, and bring them into port to answer for the offenses they have committed. When you have them here, if the British Government avows the act, then it becomes an international question between us and Great Britain. If she disavows the act, then it is for us to say what punishment we shall inflict upon the lawless persons who are thus abandoned by their Government as pirates.

I think our remedy is to take possession of the offenders and then let Great Britain either avow or disavow their conduct, and when she does, it becomes an international question between us and Great Britain; or a simple question as to what we shall do with the lawless persons who have perpetrated these outrages. It is said that our Government has not the power, under the Constitution and laws as they now stand, to capture the vessel after the act; that the extent of the executive authority is to resist the act when being done; that if our Wabash should go up to the British steamer Styx one hour after the outrage had been perpetrated, we could not take possession of the British steamer; we must follow her until she perpetrated another outrage; we must catch her in the act. You might follow her until doomsday, and she would not perpetrate another act of outrage while our ship of war was in sight of her, but would do it the moment she was out of sight. You must have an American war ship for every merchantman if you are going to protect our vessels in that way.

If the President has not the power to go any further than he has gone, I think the power should be conferred at once. I am aware that it is said if you clothe the President with the power of making the arrest and bringing the offender into port, you give him the power of making war, which, by the Constitution, is vested in Congress. It is not the war-making power which I propose to confer. I propose only to authorize the President to repel and punish aggressions in certain extreme cases, which do not admit of delay, and report the facts to Congress. The President, in fact, can involve you in war at any time. He can conduct the correspondence with the British Government concerning these outrages in such an offensive way as to compel her, in self-respect, to refuse our just demands, and thus precipitate the two countries in a war. He can do the same thing in regard to any controversy we may have with any foreign Power. But it is to be argued that, inasmuch as the President may abuse his trust, therefore you should not repose any confidence in him? That argument abolishes all Government. When you elect a President of the United States you must necessarily confide in him, for the reason that the very office vests in his hands such power as is safe only when exercised by wisdom and discretion, patriotism and justice.

I would, therefore, act on this question without reference to whether this party or that party may be in power; without reference to the political affinities or associations of the existing President. I would confer that power which a Chief Magistrate ought to have in order to enable him to maintain the honor and the dignity of the nation, and protect the flag and our citizens wherever they may go—confer the power, and hold him responsible for its abuse. I have no apprehension of the abuse of this power by the present Executive, or by any that may follow him. The jealousy of executive power which animated our forefathers in framing our system of Government, was in regard to those acts which might oppress our own citizens. The President has ample, abundant authority to perform his high functions within the limits of the United States; but while he is powerful at home under the Constitution and laws, he is almost powerless abroad for the protection of our flag and our citizens. Every other Chief Magistrate in the world possesses the authority beyond the limits of his own country, not only to repel but to punish offenses upon the flag and the citizen.

Why should we make our Chief Magistrate powerless abroad? The power that he has to exercise outside of our limits, and on the high seas, is a power in aid of the flag, and in protection of the citizen. It is not a power dangerous to our own citizens. It is not a power that can inflict injury on our own citizens. It is a power in aid of them, in defense of their rights, in the protection of their lives and their property; and that power being a safe one, in aid of and not against our own citizens, ought to be ample and full for the accomplishment of the object.

Sir, I do not believe there is danger of the Chief Magistrate of this great Republic abusing his power in a contest between the rights and honor of our citizens abroad on one side, and aggressions upon their rights on the other. I should have more apprehension that the power would not be exercised often enough, than that it would be exercised too often. You cannot protect our commerce in the Gulf of Mexico and in the Caribbean sea, nor the rights of American citizens in Mexico and Central America and South America, unless the President has power in extreme cases, where delays would defeat the object, to avenge the wrongs on the spot. Why is it that the British name is respected in all Spanish America, and the American name is despised? It is because they have learned from experience that if a British ship is attacked in their ports, or if a British subject is wronged upon the land, the first British war steamer that comes along will demand instant redress, and enforce it on the spot. Hence there is a terror in those weak, irregular, revolutionary Governments lest the punishment will instantly follow the offense; and British diplomacy, with that tact and shrewdness that always characterized it, does not fail to instill into the minds of the Mexicans, the Central Americans, and the South Americans, the fact that they may rob American citizens with impunity, for the President has no power under the laws, as they stand, to punish such conduct. All he can do is to remonstrate and scold and threaten and wait for Congress to act.

Before Congress does act another revolution has taken place in the country, the men who committed the offense are out of power, and those who turned them out then make the apology, that they did not do it, and the nation has disavowed the acts of those who did it by the revolution. Revolutions follow in rapid succession in the Spanish-American countries. The party in power immediately wants to obtain money. One of their favorite modes of raising money is to commit outrages upon American commerce, trusting that they cannot be held to an account for those outrages until another revolution shall have turned them out and brought their successors into office. I hold, therefore, that, without reference even to the question of the right of search or the British aggressions which are now being perpetrated, we ought, as a general policy, to clothe the President with the legal authority to protect our commerce and our citizens outside of the limits of the United States by summary process, whenever there is a case that does not admit of delay, and requires instant action.

For these reasons, without going into the question, I desire to engage in practical legislation by empowering the Executive to protect the honor and dignity of the country, its flag, and its citizens, instead of going over this old formula of resolutions that you must not do it again. I was in hopes, sir, that we should not have had a speech upon the subject; that a bill, simple and comprehensive, conferring full authority, would have been passed unanimously, instantly, and in silence. The passage of such bill would have carried with it more terror, more power, more practical results, in preventing these outrages, than all the armies and navies that you might muster in aid of resolutions that do not confer any legislative authority to act. I think the time for the discussion of these questions has gone by. We want no threat, we want no bluster, we want no crimination. What we want is, that the Executive shall have the power to protect our commerce and our citizens abroad, and to arrest and bring into port the offenders, even after the act has been done, and then deal with them according to the law of nations when they are within our own limits. That is my idea of the mode of treating this matter.

As I said, I will not go into the discussion; I merely throw out these general suggestions as expressive of my views, as I am a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, concurring in the report, with the reservations and exceptions to which I have referred, and as I had also brought before the Senate a bill to confer the authority which I think the President ought to possess at all times.

Mr. HAYNE. Mr. President, I rise with great diffidence. I feel that I am one of the most incompetent members of the Senate to address them on so great and so important an occasion. But, sir, I must say that I had hoped there would have been very little debate on this question. I have read the report of my distinguished friend from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I have thought that the report and the resolutions were wise, dignified, manly, and proper, and such as the occasion called for. It seems, however, that others think differently.

Sir, the attack upon the Chesapeake produced the war of 1812. I entirely approve, on all such occasions, of that prompt conduct which Oliver Cromwell and Andrew Jackson invariably exhibited; but let me tell Senators that neither Jackson nor Cromwell acted without reflection. Those great men believed that war was a great evil, but not the greatest of evils. I may illustrate my meaning by stating how individuals in a personal matter ought to act, and invariably do act, where they are governed by proper motives. If I am insulted, it is not right nor just that I should challenge my opposer. I make a statement of my case; I ask for honorable reparation, and if that is given I am satisfied. I tell Senators, however, that our honor, in the course of six or seven days, will be in the hands of our gallant Navy. Go back to the history of the war of 1812; pass all through it, and was there ever such a galaxy of glory, of greatness, of everything that our great nation might be proud of? They did their duty, sir, faithfully; and if anything occurs in the Gulf which requires that our honor should be protected, those gallant men will go down to the bottom, if need be, in doing their duty. I look upon war, and I am sure every Senator does, as a great evil under any circumstances, contrary to the cause of mankind, of morality, of Christianity; but still it is a necessary evil, and we must meet it when it becomes proper that we should do so.

From the report which has been submitted to the Senate we find the object of these aggressions, and it will be seen that southern men are specially and particularly interested to see that the honor of the country is preserved:

"The documents accompanying the message disclose the fact that these acts of visitation and examination of American vessels were sought to be justified under the plea of necessity for the suppression of the slave trade, supposed to be, or actually carried on between Africa and the island of Cuba."

Now, Mr. President, of all the people in the world the British nation ought to be the last to be obtrusive on that subject. Look at the past history of the world; look at the Island of Jamaica. Sir Charles Grey assured me that the policy pursued in that colony was a total failure, and that the whole island was in a wretched condition; and yet Great Britain really undertakes to attack us upon a great principle which we have established in this country, and which never can be changed. That is all I have to say on that point.

I will not detain the Senate. I will only repeat, that I had hoped there would be no debate on this report. The dignity of the Senate and the importance of the occasion seem to prompt the silent adoption of these resolutions, which are ample for the occasion. In any emergency we may place implicit reliance on our Navy; and, Senators, be not surprised, if within ten days, intelligence shall reach us that will enlarge the page of our naval history.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the people of Massachusetts, of New England, of the section of the country I, in part, represent, being largely engaged in commerce, having their ships in every clime and on every sea, are more directly and deeply interested than the people of any other section of the country in maintaining inviolate the American flag. Their ships, freighted with the precious cargoes of a lawful commerce, are now upon the waves of every sea under the whole heavens; and the flag which waves over them proclaims to the world their nationality and their "right," in the words of Daniel Webster, "to the free use of the ocean," "where none has a right to molest them." In no section of the Republic will the doctrine that the open sea is the highway of nations in time of peace be more inflexibly adhered to, or more strenuously maintained, at every hazard and at any cost. Vast pecuniary interests and a profound regard for national rights and national honor alike prompt them to respond to the declaration of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that the United States:

"Rest on the position not to be controverted, that, by no principle of international law, can a vessel under the flag of its country be visited or detained on the high seas, in time of peace, by any foreign Power, under any pretext or for any purpose whatever, without the consent of those over whom the flag waves."

Believing that the right of visitation, or the right of search, has no foundation in the law of nations, or in the comity due from one independent nation to other independent nations, that the attempted assertion of these claims in time of peace cannot be tolerated for a moment, by any nation, without degradation and dishonor, they will, I am sure, firmly sustain the doctrine embodied in the first resolution now pending—

"That American vessels on the high seas, in time of peace, bearing the American flag, remain under the jurisdiction of the country, and any visitation, molestation, or detention of such vessels by force, or by the exhibition of force, on the part of a foreign Power, is in derogation of the sovereignty of the United States."

Sir, the people of my section of the Union, devoted as they are by sentiment and interest, to peace with all nations, will not only respond with unanimity and zeal to these declarations, but they will demand that the outrages perpetrated by the naval forces of England on the coast of Cuba shall cease; that the Government shall demand indemnity for the aggressions of the past, and pledges of security for the future. We may, Mr. President, tolerate for a time; we may bear with some degree of patience, without national dishonor, the lawless aggressions of the feeble and disorganized Powers south of us on the American continent; at any rate, we can afford to act, and it is our duty to act, towards these weak nations with great forbearance and great moderation. Not so with England. She is a great Power; the great Power of the world. Upon her flag, the emblem of her power, the sun goes not down on the sea or on the land, in any quarter of the globe. We cannot, without national dishonor, permit any aggressive acts, or any indignities of hers to go unredressed. I am, therefore, ready to adopt, at once, prompt and effectual measures to arrest her aggressive acts, and to redress the grievances of the past. I am ready to go with him who will go furthest to maintain the honor of the American flag, and to arrest the lawless acts of the naval officers of England, which are now perpetrated almost within sight of the shores of the country.

While I am ready, Mr. President, to maintain the doctrines laid down in the report and resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Relations; while I am ready to go to the extreme verge of our rights to vindicate the honor of the country against these belligerent acts of the naval forces of Great Britain, I must avow here and now my deep mortification and shame that the flag of our country has been, and now is, prostituted with impunity by pirates engaged in the damning crime of the slave trade. I confess, Mr. President, that I read with feelings of the deepest mortification the letter of Lord Napier to the Secretary of State, in which he narrated the capture by British vessels of more than twenty ships engaged in the unlawful and infamous slave traffic under cover of the American flag. We are jealous of the rights and honor of our flag. We should not, we cannot, ay, we will not, permit any Power to violate it or tarnish it. The recent acts of British officers have touched the national heart, and aroused the national pride. We are indignant at these aggressive acts, and we demand instant reparation. That flag, the emblem of our sovereignty on the decks of our ships in every quarter of the globe—that flag of whose honor we are so jealous, has been, and now is, prostituted, shamelessly prostituted, by pirates engaged in an inhuman traffic in the bodies of our fellow-men. These accursed ships, launched in our own ports, in violation of our own laws, hover on the coasts of Africa and line the shores of Cuba, under the protecting folds of the American flag. Yes, sir, that flag, for the honor of which we are ready to peril the peace of the world, is shamelessly prostituted by men our own laws pronounce pirates—prostituted to cover a traffic our own laws pronounce piracy; a traffic which the Christian and civilized world abhors.

This prostitution of the American flag to cover a traffic abhorred of man and accursed of God, is known throughout the world, and it has brought dishonor upon the American name, and the American character. The apathy and cold indifference we have manifested at this prostitution of our flag have made the world question the sincerity of our hostility to the African slave traffic. Well may the philanthropist and the Christian whose sympathies embrace the children of misfortune—the bondsmen of Africa, torn by an inhuman traffic from their native land, and condemned to a life of unpaid toil, doubt the sincerity of our declarations of hostility to the slave trade when they witness this prostitution of our flag, our indifference to the humiliation it brings upon us, and the efforts now making in this country to repeal our laws branding the traffic as piracy, to abrogate the treaty by which we bound ourselves to cooperate with England on the coast of Africa for the suppression of the traffic, and for the reopening of that proscribed trade.

I am ready, Mr. President—I believe the people I represent are ready—to maintain with inflexible firmness the doctrine that American vessels on the high seas, in time of peace, bearing the American flag, remain under the jurisdiction of the country; and that any visitation, molestation, or detention by force, by any foreign Power, is in derogation of the sovereignty of the United States. I am ready, and I believe the people I represent are ready, to use the whole power of the country, if necessary, to repel and redress any acts by any Power, however great, which shall violate the rights or honor of the country on any deck over which the American flag waves. But I demand, Mr. President, and the people I represent demand, that the Government shall fulfill, in good faith, its treaty obligations to cooperate with England in an honest effort to suppress the slave trade. We demand that the country shall no longer be dishonored before the nations by the open and shameless prostitution of our flag to the prosecution of an inhuman and accursed traffic.

Sir, if the Government is sincerely desirous to suppress the slave trade; if it wishes to fulfill its treaty obligations; if it means to redeem the honor of the nation, now tarnished by allowing the flag of the Republic to be prostituted by pirates to cover their piracy on the coasts of Africa and on the shores of Cuba, let it at once send to the African coast, and to the waters around Cuba, vessels adapted to the work of breaking up the commerce in the bodies and souls of men, now prosecuted under cover of the American flag. If we have not ships adapted to that work, let us build them at any cost at the earliest moment, and send them to the seas now covered by pirate crafts, over which waves the flag of the Republic. By so acting we can redeem the honor of the nation, now tarnished, and demonstrate to the world that the American Government "should execute its own laws and perform its own obligations, by its own means and its own power." But if experience shall demonstrate the fact that an honest and energetic effort on our part cannot prevent the prostitution of our flag, cannot break up the slave traffic under cover of our flag, then it seems to me that justice, honor, and humanity, will alike demand that we enter into treaty obligations with England under certain limitations and restrictions, by which she shall yield the right of visitation and search, and that we shall, for a limited time, and within certain lines of latitude and of longitude, exercise the power of visitation to ascertain the character of suspected vessels sailing under our flag.

But our business now, Mr. President, is to vindicate, not the prostitution of our flag by the pirates engaged in the slave trade, but to vindicate the violation of the rights and honor of our flag by the naval forces of England, almost within cannon-shot of our own shores. This cannot be accomplished by words here. If it is necessary, in the present position of the question, for the Senate to act at all, let us look to deeds, not to words. I am ready, not to declare war, but to authorize the President to send to the Gulf, to the shores of Cuba, a naval force, with positive orders to sink or capture the British ships of war that have committed the belligerent acts complained of, and to bring them to our shores, and hold the officers of those ships personally responsible for those acts of hostility, until the British Cabinet defines its position, by avowing or disavowing their acts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the duty of the Chair to call up the special order at this hour.

Mr. MASON. It is hardly to be said that this is a debate. It is rather an expression of the opinion of the Senate; and I think it will terminate in a short time. It seems to me desirable that we should go through with it. It will have to be done at some time, and I must insist on disposing of the subject now.

Mr. HUNTER. I cannot consent to postpone the special order.

Mr. MASON. I move to postpone the special order until we dispose of these resolutions.

Mr. HUNTER. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MALLORY. If the motion be debatable, as I understand it is, I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts, that he go on and conclude his remarks on this motion.

Mr. WILSON. Oh no; I do not wish to do that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senator will allow this matter to go over until Monday. As is suggested to me by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] I do not think that settling it to-day will operate very severely on the proceedings in the Gulf between now and Monday. At any rate, if we settle it then, we shall attain as much good; and I am told there are other Senators who desire to speak on the subject. There are several appropriation bills behind, and I hope the Senate will not break over the rule of confining these matters to the morning hour, until we get through with the necessary appropriation bills. There are many of them, and they are certainly more important than the talk about this thing.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, and then I shall not object to the matter going over.

Mr. MASON. We shall lose time if this debate be prolonged on another day. I take it for granted these resolutions must be acted on during the session; and, therefore, as far as the time of the Senate is concerned, it is a matter of little moment whether it precedes or follows the close of this appropriation bill. We are the more likely to end it in a brief space, if we continue it, than if we postpone it now and resume it hereafter. I would say, also, as my impression, that in the altered relations between the two countries, it is a matter of great importance to the American people to know the decision of the Senate. I hope the special order will be postponed.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest to my colleague that the appropriation bills have to be passed three days before the adjournment; we have had an intimation on that subject; and we had better take the early portion of the time left to us, to pass the appropriation bills, and devote the latter days of the next week to these resolutions, and other matters that may come up. I must, therefore, insist on the special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, before the vote is taken on the postponement, the Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Add to the amendment of Mr. HALE:

And the President is hereby authorized and empowered to employ the naval force of the United States, and to send such force to the scene of the recent outrages, with instructions to capture the ships which have committed, or which may commit these belligerent acts.

Mr. SEWARD. I think there is no more important question that can come before Congress than the question which is now under consideration, none that is so urgent. The session may be prolonged for the passage of the appropriation bills, and I, for one, am prepared to sit here until the appropriation bills are passed, and until the action of the Senate is had on the subject now before it. I shall therefore vote for continuing the consideration of this subject, and if it is postponed, I shall ask the Senate then to take up the joint resolution to extend the session.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not propose at present to give any opinion as regards the importance of the subject now under consideration, except so far forth as to say that if it be as important as gentlemen urge it to be, it seems to me far more important to pass the naval appropriation bill, which probably the Senator from Virginia will bring forward, than to continue this discussion. So far as words conquer, we have had enough, and it seems to me we had better pass the naval appropriation bill before we do anything further on this subject at all.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on Mr. MASON's motion, resulted—yeas 20, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Durkee, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Mallory, Mason, Rice, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Clingman, Collamer, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Hammond, Hayne, Hunter, Iverson, Jones, Pearce, Pugh, Reid, Simmons, Slidell, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Wade, and Wright—32.

So the motion to postpone was not agreed to.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 209) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859; the question pending being upon the motion of Mr. KING to amend the amendment of the Committee on Finance, with respect to the completion of certain custom-house buildings, by the addition of the following clause:

The Secretary of the Treasury is required to execute the provisions of the acts of Congress, approved August 16, 1853, and March 3, 1857, authorizing and directing the said Secretary to cause to be constructed buildings therein mentioned for custom-house and post office purposes, and for the accommodation of the courts of the United States, and the appropriations made by the said acts are continued for the purpose of the execution of the said provisions of said laws.

Mr. KING. I offered the amendment, not because I believed in the ordinary and proper course of proceedings on the part of the different departments of the Government it was necessary, but because I understood it was the intention of the Secretary of the Treasury not to carry out these laws; and I ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether it is not his understanding that these appropriations are not to be expended?

Mr. HUNTER. I do not understand any such thing. I understand that if there was money enough in the Treasury for them all, the Secretary of the Treasury would carry out these laws. I stated, yesterday, the reasons which governed him, and, I think, properly governed him, in his selection.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman state what his views about that are? I understood him, yesterday, that the law was not to be carried out.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator certainly misunderstood me. I stated that the appropriations exceeded the money in the Treasury, and that being the case, the Secretary had to discriminate, and the discrimination which he made was this: he took those on which there were existing contracts, those on which a great deal of money had been expended, and only a few thousand dollars were necessary to cover them in and complete them. He applied the money to those buildings, leaving others, where there had been no commencement, to be prosecuted when there should be more money in the Treasury. I did not understand—on the contrary, I understood the opposite—that the Secretary has any design to permit them to lapse, if the state of the Treasury should be such as to enable him to carry them on.

Mr. KING. The declarations now made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance are somewhat modified from what I understood him to say yesterday; but I had a conversation with the Secretary of the Treasury himself on this subject, and I stated to him that I should have to make this point, if the law was not carried out. Gentlemen talk about the want of money in the Treasury. Is it the business of the Executive Departments to execute the laws of the country, or have they a power of dispensation in reference to these matters, to dispose of the Treasury as they please? Are appropriations made by Congress, in which the law is express, in which the Secretary is not only authorized but directed to construct these buildings, distributed about the country, to be carried out by him or not at his pleasure? It is claimed that he has the right to determine for what purposes he will make these expenditures, if there is not money enough in the Treasury. Well, sir, how much money does he want in the Treasury? He commenced this fiscal year with a surplus of fifteen or twenty millions. At the commencement of the present session, he asked for a loan of $20,000,000, and it was promptly granted by Congress. Within the past ten days he came forward again, and asked for an additional loan of $15,000,000, which has been granted so far as this body is concerned. In addition to this, he has the revenues of the country, the duties on imports, and the proceeds of the public land sales. All these moneys go into the Treasury; and it is the business and duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to make his estimates, and to call for his supply of funds to meet the appropriations which are made by Congress, and especially those which have been made a year or two in advance. It is the strangest thing in the world to me, that people will have the assurance to come in here before Congress and attempt to justify the Executive Departments of the Government for refusing to carry out and execute the acts of Congress, and put in their ifs and their ands, saying if there is enough of money in the Treasury they are going to do this and that.

Sir, there is money enough here to expend eight or ten million dollars for a foray on the Utah people, which I never believed was designed against the people of Utah; but I always regarded it as designed rather against Kansas than against Utah. Some six or eight million dollars to be expended by this Government to force the Lecompton constitution on the people of Kansas against their will; and yet the Secretary of the Treasury cannot find money to carry out an appropriation of sixty or eighty or a hundred thousand dollars in a dozen places, scattered over the country, amounting, perhaps, in all to a million dollars, because he chooses to apply the funds in the Treasury to some other purpose, and to say that there is not any for this purpose. According to my ideas, it is the business of the executive department to carry out the appropriations made by Congress. If I could have the assurance of the chairman of the Committee on Finance that this would be done, or if I had not understood that it was the expectation that these appropriations were to pass by and to lapse, so that a distinct appropriation would hereafter be required from Congress to carry them out, I should not have deemed it necessary to offer this proposition; but I regard an intimation of that sort as entirely sufficient that some action should be taken on this matter. If Congress and the country choose to recognize the idea that the Executive Departments shall not execute the laws, but are to exercise their discretion, and are to assign to us as a reason that they are not to do so on account of want of funds in the Treasury, and we to be told every time we ask them to carry out an act of Congress, "Give us the money;" be it so. But, sir, Congress has given them $35,000,000 in addition to the revenue for this single year; and yet they call for more money. When you ask them to carry out an appropriation made by an act of Congress passed two years ago, they want more money. It would be cheaper, in the locality I feel concerned in, to carry round a subscription paper and raise the funds, and execute these works ourselves, than it would be to call on the Government, if this is the way they dispose of the moneys they have on hand, and then ask for more. The chairman of the Committee on Finance does not state as explicitly as he did yesterday his understanding of this matter; but I state mine distinctly, and that is the reason I have deemed it proper to offer this proposition, and to bring it to the attention of the Senate and of the country.

Mr. TOOMBS. I suggested yesterday the impropriety of taking action upon the defective information which the Senate necessarily had with reference to this question, and especially upon the Ogdensburg custom-house. The Senator from New York said he knew all the facts. If he did, and had explained them to the Senate, I think there would have been very little difficulty about the matter. Some of the charges that I understood him to make are fully repelled by the record, which, I presume, he knew, or might have known, as he seemed to have interested himself in the locality. The original appropriation for the Ogdensburg custom-house was made on the 18th of August, 1856, and an additional one on the 3d of March, 1857. The site was conditionally purchased by Mr. Guthrie on the 20th of January, 1857, and the validity of the title certified to by the Attorney General on the 27th of February, 1857. It thus appears, from the facts, that the charge which the Senator made yesterday, as I understood him, that the present Secretary of the Treasury had given the money for the site to a favorite of his, is shown to be without the least shadow of foundation. The contract for it was made before the present Secretary came into office. So much for that point.

In the next place, the payment was delayed, under the conditions of the purchase, until the disability was removed. According to law, nothing could be done in the work until the revenue collected in that collection district equaled the expenses of its collection. The previous Secretary of the Treasury made a conditional contract for the purchase of a lot, to take effect when that should happen, whenever the receipts should equal the expenses of the collection of the revenue in that district. The conditional contract which Mr. Guthrie made had to be complied with; and on the 27th of August, 1857, the Attorney General certified it to the Department to be his duty, under Mr. Guthrie's contract, to pay for the land. So far from the Treasury Department attempting to make the contract with a favorite, and pay him money, the contract was made by the predecessor of the present Secretary, and he resisted the performance of it, believing that there was no power to make even a conditional contract for the purchase of land until the happening of the contingency upon which the law authorized him to build a custom-house. The present Secretary, taking this view, declined to comply with that contract, and the matter was referred to the Attorney General, who, on the 27th of August, 1857, in the midst of the commercial disturbances of the country, a certificate having been given shortly before by the collector of the customs that this provision of the law had been complied with, said that the Secretary was bound to comply with the contract of Mr. Guthrie, and so the money was paid for the site.

The Senator would have the Senate believe that this work ought to have been going on ever since the 16th of August, 1856, when in fact it was never determined that this case was within the law until the 27th of August, 1857, in the very midst of the commercial revulsion. The Secretary of the Treasury resisted compliance with the contract. So far from desiring to put money into the pocket of a favorite, he resisted the whole payment to the extent of carrying it to the Attorney General to know whether the Government was bound to carry out the contract for the purchase of the lot. Owing to the objections of the citizens to the site selected, no payment therefor was made until March 9, 1858. This speedy favoritism by which to pay a friend for the lot, was secured under the coercion of the Attorney General, under his judgment that the law compelled the Secretary to pay the money, and it was not paid until the 9th of March, 1858.

Again, and owing to the same causes, although a site was paid for, the commencement of the work was delayed in consequence of the state of the finances, which made it necessary to confine the expenditures for such objects to buildings already commenced. The contractor changed his own contract, even when a partial one had been made. He did not include iron, it seems, and altered his contract and refused to carry it out. On looking into the proper sources of information, I am further authorized to say, that in regard to every one of these custom-houses where the legal prerequisites were complied with, the jurisdiction of the States ceded, and the power of taxation relinquished, and the other conditions of the law complied with before the convulsion came on, every one of them was put in operation. The others were not, because it could not have been done without a violation of law. The whole difficulty, I have no doubt, was in this law, and that is the anxiety of the Senator from New York. This appropriation could not stand by itself, but under the log-rolling system by which such things are passed, it got in, probably with better works, and if the money should go back into the Treasury, the Senator knows he could not get the appropriation, because it cannot stand on its own merits, and hence no doubt the anxiety he manifests on this subject.

The Secretary of the Treasury has done precisely his duty. He has not, he will not, and he ought not to apply the money to carry on this custom-house until the funds are provided by Congress. The Senator talks about a dispensing power. The Secretary of the Treasury does not claim it; nobody claims it. The Senator urges it from time to time in the face of the disclaimer and when the reasons are full, fair, and perfectly satisfactory to everybody in the Senate, I presume, but himself. The Secretary has claimed no power to prevent the execution of a law of Congress, whatever he may think of it, even though it might direct him to throw money into the sea. He exercised no such power, but has simply endeavored to protect the public interest according to law, and according to the terms of the act which directed him to make the expenditure. He was charged yesterday with spending large sums in buying up the public debt. That was done in accordance with law, and no doubt if at that time that custom-house had been in a condition to be built, a portion of the surplus in the Treasury would have been applied to it. Under the conditions of the law, the commissioner of customs had first to certify that there was revenue enough collected in the district to meet the expenses of its collection, and I think on close examination it will be found that this custom-house was carried up to that point by some casual importation, perhaps, of railroad iron. It was carried up probably by temporary causes, and it ought not to have been done at all. I have no doubt a close examination into the matter will show it to be a doubtful case whether even to-day it is within the law. There has been no assertion at any time by the Secretary of the Treasury, or by any part of the executive Government as far as I know, of any right or power to withhold the execution of the law according to its letter and tenor, whatever that law may be; but the ground is taken, and it will be maintained by Congress and the country, that when the appropriations of Congress have exceeded the revenue, it becomes the duty of the executive Government first to apply the money in the Treasury to those great objects which are necessary to carry on the Government, and if there is any to be applied to such works, to expend it first in finishing those already pending where there would be a loss to the Government if they were not carried on, and to leave those which have not been commenced until Congress chooses to supply the money by loans, or until the revenues of the country afford the means. I know of no object in that whole class which could better afford to wait than the custom-house at Ogdensburg, where they have now barely thrown the collection of of revenue above the expenses of collection. It would have been a marked case I suppose of all in the United States. If there was a place for retrenchment, for avoiding the expenditure of money with a deficient fund, it was in Ogdensburg. I say then that the amendment ought not to prevail. There is no occasion for it in order to carry out the law. The law will be carried out if the money comes in within the three years that an appropriation is allowed to stand, and if it does not, it is not the public interest to do it at all.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Georgia puts this on a ground upon which I resist it, except in one respect. He seems to regard the Secretary of the Treasury as having some personal position in this matter. I spoke of the Secretary of the Treasury—the officer; whether it is Mr. Guthrie or Mr. Cobb is a matter of indifference to me. This is not a personal matter between the incumbent of the Treasury Department and this law. It is a question whether the Secretary of the Treasury, whoever he may be, shall have the right to dispense with the law. It seems now, from the reports that are made, that the money was not paid until the 9th of March last. I made no inquiries about the case until very recently, when I learned that the site had been purchased and paid for, and that it was not intended to do anything more. That was the information I had, and that the conclusion reached in the judgment and decision of the Secretary of the Treasury, was that the state of the finances was such that the Treasury Department had determined not to go on with this work. I presented this very point which I now present to the Senate—and it is a matter in which every Senator and every person in the country has just as much interest as I have—to ascertain and determine whether this discretion, this dispensing power—for it is that—exists in the Treasury Department or not.

The Senator from Georgia talks of the want of money. Well, sir, how much money does the Secretary of the Treasury or the Administration want? They have all the funds collected from the revenue; they have all the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; and I believe they have recently been selling some military reservations, not at a very great price; and they have had $35,000,000 of loans during the present year. It is the business of the Secretary of the Treasury, it is the business of the Departments, to estimate for what Congress has required them to expend; and let us have the estimates, that the money may be furnished, and not come here and tell us that if we want the laws carried out we must supply the money. How do they want the money supplied? Do they want a special act to raise the funds upon every appropriation? It is absurd. A proposition was made the other day by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SIMMONS,] to endeavor, by the protection of the revenue against frauds arising from false and foreign valuations, to bring us a home valuation, and put a little money into the Treasury; but that was resisted by these very gentlemen.

Now, the point in relation to which I think the executive department of the Government is wrong—and I speak of it in that respect—is this attempt to set up a discretion on their part to carry out appropriations that are made by Congress for one object, and refuse to carry them out in another, on the ground that one is more expedient or more appropriate to the public interest than another. I deny that any such discretion exists, or ought to exist, in the Department. There are reasons, just reasons, to complain of this partiality and favoritism; for it leads to that, and it leads to corruption of the grossest and basest character. Here contracts are made without appropriations, and then the friends of the Administration in Congress insist that appropriations must be made to meet the expenditures on these contracts, because the debt has been contracted; and yet in other cases, where Congress has made an appropriation, the Department refuses to make contracts to carry it out. Where is the power of this Government, under such an administration of it? There is no law or authority to direct and control these matters, and this should be a Government of law; and it is as much the business of the President, of the Secretaries, and of all the high functionaries and high officials of the Government, to submit to and execute the law, as it is of the humblest citizen of the country; and any doctrine opposite to that, which claims for them this arbitrary discretion, is dangerous to the safety, and dangerous to the administration of the Government everywhere.

Mr. HUNTER. I must say that I am surprised at the pertinacity with which the Senator from New York repeats his statement of the case, after he has been so often corrected as to the real state of the facts by the Senator from Georgia. If he disputes those facts, he ought to bring his evidence. Now, the Secretary of the Treasury has shown that he has not failed to carry out any appropriation, except in those instances in which the conditions of the law were not complied with before the general break-down in the Treasury. But, sir, what is the case before us? The Senator evidently does not understand that—

Mr. KING. I dislike very much to interrupt a Senator when he is speaking; but the Senator from Virginia persists in putting this case differently from what I do. He speaks of it as if the Secretary intended to execute the law. The Senator from Georgia, with more frankness, tells us that he does not, unless there is money put into the Treasury to carry it out; and that is the point about this matter. If I could have an assurance that the Secretary intended to execute the law; indeed, if he had not indicated that he did not intend to execute it, I should not have brought forward this proposition.

Mr. HUNTER. Does the Senator from New York impute to me a design to misrepresent the Secretary?

Mr. KING. I do not know what the Senator's design is; I stated nothing about his design.

Mr. HUNTER. What does the Senator mean by saying that the Senator from Georgia spoke with more frankness than I did? Does he impute to me a design to conceal anything?

Mr. KING. I speak plainly; I intend what I say, and I intend nothing else. I impute nothing of design; but I say that the Senator, in speaking of this matter, speaks of a scheme which the Secretary designs to execute. My ground is, that the Secretary does not design to execute this law.

Mr. HUNTER. Well, the Senator has undertaken to make that statement; and I say, if I can trust the Secretary, the gentleman is mistaken. I learn very differently from the Secretary; I learn that he would execute the law if there was money in the Treasury, and I have stated that to the gentleman; and now he gets up and says I misstate the Secretary's intentions. How does he know them? Has he learned them from him?

Mr. KING. The Senator asserts that I am in error, and he goes on and reiterates the same statement. I say the Secretary states that he does not intend to carry out these laws, because, as he alleges, of the small amount of money in the Treasury, and the Senator from Virginia says he would do it if there was money in the Treasury; he puts in the condition. If there were ample funds in the Treasury, money for every purpose, and this too, I do not say that the Secretary then would not carry out this law; but my complaint is, that he discriminates in this matter, and contracts are made for which appropriations are not made, and those are carried out; and that he refuses to make contracts to carry out objects for which appropriations are made. I hope the Senator will understand me.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from New York misunderstands the whole matter. He has not stated the case as it is really presented to us. I do not know why; it is not because he has not been corrected often enough. I do not know why it is that he will persist in misstating it in this manner. What is it that the Secretary asks for? He asks here for appropriations to authorize him to expend money on certain works in regard to which there have been contracts—contracts not made by himself. There are no appropriations in order to carry them out, and he asks that appropriations may be made, in order that he may carry them out. But, in the cases to which the Senator from New York refers, there have been appropriations; he wants no new appropriation; there is the authority, and how does the Senator know that he will not use that authority? I say he tells me if he had the money he would use it. If he has not the money, how can you make him use it, unless you mean, by passing such an amendment as the Senator now proposes, to say that he shall expend the money in the Treasury on these works, in preference to expending it on the Army and Navy, and on the most indispensable wants of the Government? That is the whole point. You propose, by this amendment, to force him to expend it on these custom-houses, in regard to which he has had no authority to expend it, until recently, until this break-down in the Treasury, no matter if every other interest in the country suffers; because you choose to assume, on the statement of the Senator from New York, made without authority, (for I will venture to say the Secretary never told him so, as I understand very differently from the Secretary,) that he means these appropriations to lapse, and does not design to spend a dollar upon them. Now, I say, in regard to that, so far as the future is concerned, if there be more appropriations than revenue, the Secretary ought, in exercising a sound discretion where there is not money enough for all, to expend it for those objects in regard to which there exist contracts, and contracts, let me say here, not made by himself. I learn, on inquiry, that the contracts made for New Orleans and Charleston were made before either he or Mr. Guthrie came into office—contracts for materials in these structures which the Government was engaged in erecting. It is in order to carry out these contracts, and to carry out the contract for the Treasury building, made by Mr. Guthrie, who was authorized, as he supposed, by the terms of the existing law directing the building to be constructed on a certain plan. It is to carry out these contracts that most of these appropriations are desired.

I know that my friend from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] seemed to complain that these appropriations were sectional in their character—for the Treasury building here, and for custom-houses in Charleston and New Orleans. Now, I learn from the Commissioner of Customs that probably four out of every five dollars of these appropriations will go to the North; for they are for materials. They will go to New Jersey and New York for the iron, they will go to New England for the granite and marble which are to be furnished. These are quarried by New England men, and conveyed by New England ships; and, so far as there is any sectional aspect in the matter, I learn that nearly all the money will go North, and north even of Pennsylvania.

I say, then, that it is unfair, on any evidence which is before us, upon anything which is before the Senator from New York, to impute to the Secretary of the Treasury a design to claim any dispensing power. He claims no such thing. He comes before you and asks for appropriations to enable him to fulfill existing contracts, or appropriations to enable him to make little expenditures which are necessary, in some cases, to cover in and complete buildings nearly finished, upon which large sums have been expended. He asks for appropriations for that purpose; but he does not ask for appropriations for anything beyond what is already appropriated in regard to custom-houses where there is no such necessity. So far as those works are concerned of which the Senator speaks, there are appropriations; he wants no further authority from Congress, but he may want money; and, if he has not enough money to execute all the laws, no man can blame him for preferring to execute those in regard to which there are existing contracts in preference to those where there are none. That is the real state of the case; and I say that, in view of the condition of the Treasury, he has estimated for enough on these buildings. Indeed, I felt some reluctance in voting as much as he did estimate for; but we know that the means which have been granted have been considered, even by gentlemen on the other side, as not sufficient to meet the expenditure for which we have estimated. Why, then, should we force him—especially why should those who refuse to give him means by way of loans, undertake to press him to execute such works as these in preference to measures indispensably required for the good of the country? for the effect would be to make him expend money on these buildings in preference to all other objects, if there was not enough for all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, the country will, I think, owe a debt of gratitude to the Senator from New York for exposing this matter. It is another evidence of the tendency of the executive power to assume authority—a point to which I have attempted, on several occasions, to call the attention of the country; and I am very glad to have the assistance of the Senator from New York in exposing a part of this assumed authority. Now, sir, what is the charge? The charge is, that the Secretary of the Treasury is omitting or refusing to apply the money appropriated by Congress, and that that Department of the Government is going on and making contracts without authority of law; and to carry out those contracts, the Finance Committee recommended appropriations, thus, as I conceive, holding out a reward for favoritism and partiality on the part of the Executive. I am not talking of this particular Secretary; I care not whether this course of conduct is pursued by the present Secretary of the Treasury, or the former Secretary of the Treasury, or the one who preceded him. I am against the exercise of unwarranted authority, by friend or foe. I care not who is President, or what Administration assumes authority contrary to the Constitution and the laws of the country; I will denounce and condemn it in every one, and in all alike.

Now, sir, let us look at the facts of this case. The act of Congress of 1820 declares:

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That no contract shall hereafter be made by the Secretary of State or of the Treasury or of the Department of War or of the Navy, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment; and except, also, contracts for subsistence and clothing of the Army or Navy, and contracts by the quartermaster's department, which may be made by the Secretaries of those Departments."

These exceptions relate to supplies for the Army and Navy, and have nothing to do with the point now in controversy. That is the law. Now what has the Government done? In 1856, an appropriation was made "For completing the custom-house at Norfolk, Virginia, $54,652 53." It was for completing the work. Will the Senator from Virginia tell me that under that law the Secretary of the Treasury had authority to make a contract for completing that building which should cost more than $54,652 53? The appropriation was to complete the custom-house at Norfolk; and the Secretary of the Treasury had no authority to make a contract for a larger amount than was appropriated to its completion. But what does the Senator from Virginia report here? He brings in an amendment from the Finance Committee, in which he recommends—

"For the completion of the custom-house at Norfolk, Virginia, $20,000."

And then he tells us that the Finance Committee report merely appropriations to carry out existing contracts; and an attempt is made to draw a distinction between the obligation to pay money which the officers of the Government have contracted to pay, and its actual payment. When the executive department is charged with disbursing money without authority of law, the Secretary of the Treasury tells us, "No, they have not disbursed a dollar; they have only made the contract by which they have agreed to disburse!" Is not that a violation of law? They have made a contract to disburse $20,000 for the completion of the Norfolk custom-house according to the authority of the Senator from Virginia, for he says this appropriation is merely to carry out existing contracts; but I say there was no authority of law to make such a contract.

Mr. HUNTER. I will state that I learned this morning that some of these items are small appropriations, as I stated in my remarks just now, designed to complete buildings on which a good deal has already been expended. The amount for such cases is small. Many of them, I am told, have occurred. For instance, here is a case at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, where they contracted with the lowest bidder; but the man broke, and could not execute the work. What are we to do? The work is partly completed, and the Department asks for a sum to complete it. The same is the case in New Haven, Connecticut; the man broke. In Galena, Illinois, they contracted to build a custom-house according to specifications for a certain sum; but upon digging down the foundation they found quicksand. That, of course, increased the amount. That, of course, was a contingency, an accident, for which provision will have to be made. It is the same case with the marine hospital at New Orleans, and the marine hospital at St. Louis. At St. Louis, they came to quicksand seventeen feet in depth, which they did not expect—had not anticipated; yet they had made a contract for a certain depth of foundation, and a certain size; but they found that they had to drive piles to secure the foundation. In most of these instances, where there is any large difference, it occurred in that way. There are some small appropriations asked for that are merely to complete buildings that are nearly completed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then this is a change of ground. Yesterday the appropriations recommended were to carry out existing contracts. Yesterday I understood it to be denied that any contracts had been made contrary to law. I show the law where an appropriation was made to complete a particular work, and a further appropriation is asked at this time for this very work; and now I am answered by being told that a further sum is necessary; that these are a different class of cases. I have not looked into every one of these cases.

Mr. HUNTER. The very large bulk of this appropriation is to carry out existing contracts; most of the items are for existing contracts. There are some few instances, to which I have just referred, in which the estimate is for the completion of the building. There may be no existing contract for it. I believe there is none.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I find that the appropriation bill of 1856 contained this clause:

"For the completion of the marine hospital at New Orleans, in addition to the appropriations heretofore made by an act approved August 4, 1854, $151,659 20."

Now, here is proposed to be appropriated by this amendment of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, for the completion of the same work, $85,000.

Mr. HUNTER. I can explain that. I am informed by the constructor or agent, Colonel Bowman—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will hear the explanation. I think a good many will be necessary.

Mr. HUNTER. That occurred in this way: when they got down to the depth required by the contract, they came to water, and it was necessary to drain and fill in, in order to protect the building. It was useless to put up the structure with water undermining it, and that occasioned a cost not anticipated when the contract was made for the whole building.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Doubtless some excuse will be found for all these extraordinary appropriations. I presume that the officers of the Government will not come out and acknowledge the truth of the accusation which the Senator from New York has brought against the administration of the Executive Departments. I could hardly expect it. But New Orleans is not the only case. Norfolk is another. The Senator from Virginia did not tell us that the appropriation fell short at Norfolk, and I presume if I were to look through this list I could find many instances such as those to which I have called attention.

What was the excuse set up yesterday by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS?]? When the Senator from New York first made this accusation against the Department, he was answered by the Senator from Missouri that there was no money. He was told it was unjust to charge upon the Department the refusal to carry out the law in erecting a building which Congress had directed him to erect, when they did not furnish him the money with which to do it. The Senator from Georgia reiterated the charge. Well, sir, what are the facts? The Senator from New York turned to the law, and showed that in 1856 these appropriations were made, and the Secretary was then required to erect certain buildings. We turn to the Secretary's report, and we find by his annual report communicated to us, that at the commencement of the fiscal year, in July, 1857, nearly a year after the time when the appropriations were made, there were lying idle in your Treasury something more than seventeen million dollars. Looking further at the report, you find that the receipts for the next quarter were nearly twenty-one million dollars, and the expenditures $23,000,000, leaving some fifteen million dollars on hand on the 1st of September last. Was there no money? There was so much money that the Secretary of the Treasury did not know what to do with it, and was appropriating it to the purchase of the indebtedness of the United States not yet due, by paying the extravagant premium of some fifteen or seventeen per cent. This excuse was then abandoned, and it is said now we have no money. Is that so? Has the Treasury of the United States ever been empty? Are there not millions in it to-day? The truth is, that the Government of the United States has never been without money, and the Senator from Virginia is very ready with his loans of twenty and fifteen millions to supply it in advance with all the funds it may need.

But, sir, the Government has upon hand, and has had all the time, money sufficient to have proceeded with the erection of these public buildings. Why, then, has it not been done? I suppose it has not been done for some such reason as this. The Secretary in his annual report tells us:

"There are other public works of less necessity, which for a variety of causes have not been commenced. A temporary postponement of them will violate no existing contracts; will deprive no one of employment to which he is authorized to look; will inflict no wrong upon any portion of the people; but will enable the Government to realize its means in advance of its expenditure of them, and perhaps avoid the necessity of increasing the public debt."

Here we see foreshadowed the reason why these works have not been commenced. The money was diverted by the Secretary of the Treasury to other works, to carry out contracts which had been made, and made, if this appropriation now asked for is to carry out contracts, I reiterate, without authority of law; for no Senator can justify an officer of this Government in making a contract to complete a work which requires more money than he is authorized to use for its completion. Will the Senator from Georgia, or the Senator from Virginia undertake to justify that? If not, then strike from this appropriation which is now pending the provisions made for the completion of works where money has been appropriated sufficiently for that purpose heretofore.

I do not understand the basis upon which the Finance Committee have proceeded in recommending these appropriations. The second of them is:

"For continuing the work on the custom-house at Charleston, South Carolina, $300,000."

It would be, I have no doubt, interesting to the country to know what the custom-house at Charleston is to cost. Has any one any idea what it is to cost? I do not profess to know, for this $300,000 is not for finishing it; it is "for continuing" the work; but I will tell you what I can inform the Senate and the country of: I can tell them that more than one million seven hundred thousand dollars have been appropriated to the construction of a custom-house at Charleston, and $300,000 is asked "for continuing" the work. If it were for the completion of the work, we could see where the thing was to end. I will take that back, however. We cannot see the cost when the money is appropriated for the completion of the work—it is not completed. We have the example here before us that when Congress appropriates $150,000 to the completion of a particular work, we are called upon at the next session to appropriate $80,000 more to complete the same work; and we are urged to vote for it on the ground that contracts are entered into.

Now, I agree entirely in what the Senator from New York has said, that there is no excuse for the Secretary of the Treasury for not having applied the money appropriated by Congress, within a reasonable time, to construct the works which he was required to build; and I reiterate that there is no excuse for any officer of this Government making a contract to pay money which an act of Congress has not given him authority to make; and that every one of these appropriations contained in this bill, which money had before been appropriated to complete, is holding out a reward and an inducement to the Department to enter into a contract without authority of law, with the idea that then Congress will foot the bill. There are some cases like this: where appropriations were made for the erection of public buildings, and the amount appropriated was found to be insufficient to complete such a building as the Government would require, the Secretary has refused, in some instances, though not in all, it seems, to commence the work. Well, what is the condition of those localities? The work is not begun, and therefore this Congress will make no appropriations to commence it; but if the Secretary of the Treasury could have been induced, where $100,000 had been appropriated, to construct a building which he ascertained it would cost $150,000 to make of appropriate dimensions, to commence the work and expend the $100,000, then Congress, according to the principle adopted by the Finance Committee, would come in and appropriate the other $50,000 to complete the work, because contracts had been made, and it was in process of erection; but if he had done his duty, and not used the money at all where the law directed him not to make a contract, unless he could make it for completing the work for the amount appropriated, then he is not to be directed to proceed and construct such a building as the money would erect. I hope, sir, the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be adopted. I think it a most important one.

Mr. IVERSON. Is the amendment of the Senator from New York in a condition to be amended by a proviso?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. STUART.) Not at this time. It is an amendment to an amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. IVERSON. If the amendment prevails, I understand I shall then have a right to amend it, and I give notice that if it prevails, I shall move to attach a proviso to it in the following words:

Provided, The condition of the public finances shall, in his (the Secretary of the Treasury's) opinion, authorize the immediate expenditure, if necessary for the immediate prosecution of said works.

It is true, Mr. President, that the Administration have determined not to commence works which have not already been commenced, because I have it personally from the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Navy. They have determined not to go on with works which Congress have authorized to be constructed that have not already been commenced. At what time that determination was made, I am not informed, but I suppose immediately after the great revulsion in our commercial affairs, when it was seen that the Treasury would be in a deplorable condition. I had occasion to apply to the Secretary of the Navy on this subject, sometime since, by the passage of a resolution of this body, calling for information. It will be remembered that at the last session of the last Congress $200,000 was appropriated for the construction of a naval depot near Brunswick, Georgia. As no work had been commenced there, I called on the Secretary of the Navy to state the reasons why the work had not been commenced. In response to that resolution, the Secretary of the Navy, on the 13th of May, 1858, sent a communication to the Senate setting forth what had been done in that case precisely as it is understood and stated here, has been done in the case of the Ogdensburg custom-house. They have gone on and purchased a site; they have bought the land on which the depot is to be erected, after a negotiation in relation to the price, on ascertainment of the legal title, and a cession of jurisdiction by the State of Georgia; but they have not commenced the works which Congress authorized to be constructed. The reason why that has not been done is disclosed in the communication of the Secretary of the Navy. He says:

"In reply to the inquiry why the commencement of the necessary works has not been made, I would state that there is no money in the Treasury which can be applied for that purpose without diverting it from other indispensable objects. They fall within the class of public works authorized by Congress, which not having been commenced, it is not deemed expedient or proper to commence during the present condition of the Treasury."

There is the whole of it. Congress has gone on to appropriate money for the construction of this, that, and other works: the Administration finds itself without the necessary means to complete them or to go on with them; and it determines to suspend their construction until the Treasury gets in a better condition. I think that is right. I make no issue whatever with the Secretary of the Navy in relation to the construction of a naval depot at Brunswick, because I believe he has acted fairly and properly on the subject. The Administration find they have no money; the revenues have fallen off nearly fifty per cent., and the Government has not the money to construct these works. What is it to do? The Senator from New York and the Senator from Illinois complain that it exercises a discretion. That is not only proper, but the executive officers are bound, from necessity, to exercise a discretion. Congress appropriates so much money for this object, and so much for another, and so much for another, and appropriates altogether, fifty, or sixty, or seventy, or eighty million dollars; and the Secretary of the Treasury finds that he has not got money enough to carry out all these objects of appropriation. What is he to do? He must necessarily exercise his judgment as to how the money is to be applied; he must of necessity, as well as of propriety, determine which of these appropriations shall be carried out; he must exercise his judgment, according to the best dictates of his conscience, as to what the public service demands; and this I understand he has done, and it is just and proper that he should exercise this judgment. The Government could not be carried on in any other way. If Congress demands of the Executive to perform certain functions, and does not place the money in his possession to perform them, I want to know how he is to do it? Gentlemen on the other side come forward here and appropriate large sums of money for the construction of certain works; the money is not in the Treasury to accomplish the object; and then they complain of the Secretary that he does not do the works without the money to accomplish them; and when the Secretary calls on them to raise money by loans or Treasury notes, they refuse to do it. They say, "we will not give you a dollar; we will not vote you a loan; we will not vote you Treasury notes; we will not vote anything by which you may put additional sums in the Treasury; but we demand of you to carry out these appropriations and expend the money: we insist that you shall build the Ogdensburg custom-house, although you have not the money, nor will we give you the means of doing it." This is a very extraordinary doctrine to me. I do not understand in what school of ethics, or of morals, or of honor, or of honesty, the gentlemen have studied. They vote against every bill which authorizes the raising of money; they vote against the loan bill; they vote against the Treasury-note bill; they vote against everything by which the Government call on you to put money in the Treasury, in order to enable them to carry out these objects; and yet they are all the time piling on appropriation after appropriation that the Government are called upon to execute. I do not understand that mode of fairness. If that is fair legislation, or a fair mode of dealing with the Administration, I certainly have misunderstood the true meaning of terms. I think that the Secretary of the Treasury is entitled to exercise his discretion; the Government are bound to exercise discretion when they are called upon to expend money for various objects of appropriation. If they have not money enough to carry them all out, they must select those which, in their judgment, the public exigency and the public service demand. If they did not do that, they would be subject to a public odium under which no Administration could ever stand.

I give notice, that if the amendment of the Senator from New York prevails, if he wants this amendment of his for the purpose of calling the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to this work, if he wants it for the purpose of stimulating him to the construction of this work when means are provided, or if he wants it for the purpose of preventing the lapse of the appropriation, to prevent the money going into the surplus fund at the expiration of the time at which the law provides such appropriations shall lapse, I propose to add this proviso of mine, still reserving a discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury to go on with the works if the public finances will justify it, and not otherwise.

Mr. PUGH called for the yeas and nays, on the amendment to the amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. MASON. I have paired off on this question with the Senator from New York, [Mr. Seward.]

Mr. SIMMONS. I have paired off with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Polk.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Dixon, Durkee, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Finch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Pearce, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Sidel, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—29.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected; and the question recurred on the amendment of the Finance Committee, as follows:

For continuing the extension of the Treasury building, $500,000.

For continuing the work on the custom-house at New Orleans, Louisiana, $350,000.

For continuing the work on the custom-house at Charleston, South Carolina, $300,000.

For the completion of custom-houses at the following places, namely: at Ellsworth, Maine, $2,000; at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $50,000; at Bristol, Rhode Island, including fencing and grading, $5,000; at New Haven, Connecticut, $60,000; at Oswego, New York, $10,000; at Flatsburg, New York, $10,000; at Newark, New Jersey, $10,000; at Norfolk, Virginia, $20,000; at Pensacola, Florida, $5,000; at St. Louis, Missouri, $20,000; at Mobile, Alabama, including fencing and paving, $30,000; at Galena, Illinois, $10,000; at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, $10,000; and for annual repairs at custom-houses, $15,000.

For the completion of marine hospitals at the following places, namely: at Portland, Maine, $3,000; at St. Mark's, Florida, $2,500; at New Orleans, Louisiana, including filling up site, grading, introducing gas and water pipes, and fixtures, and fencing, $85,000; at Cincinnati, Ohio, $50,000; at Galena, Illinois, $5,000; and for annual repairs at marine hospitals, $15,000.

For fencing, grading, paving, and furnishing the custom-houses at the following places, namely: at Ellsworth, Maine, $3,000; at Bath, Maine, (for furniture alone,) $1,100; at Burlington, Vermont, $1,600; at New Haven, Connecticut, $8,500; at Oswego, New York, $7,300; at Plattsburg, New York, $9,900; at Newark, New Jersey, $5,200; at Alexandria, Virginia, $3,700; at Norfolk, Virginia, $12,000; at Mobile, Alabama, (for furniture alone,) $2,600; at Pensacola, Florida, $2,500; at St. Louis, Missouri, $14,000; at Louisville, Kentucky, $3,900; at Cleveland, Ohio, $7,100; at Galena, Illinois, $3,700; at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, $7,700.

For fencing, grading, paving, and furnishing, the marine hospitals at the following places, namely: at Burlington, Vermont, $3,400; at Chelsea, Massachusetts, (out buildings, grading, and fencing,) $19,700; at St. Mark's, Florida, $1,200; at Detroit, Michigan, $7,500; at Galena, Illinois, $3,800; at Burlington, Iowa, $4,100.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment. It contains this clause:

"For continuing the work on the custom-house at New Orleans, Louisiana, $350,000."

I want to add these words:

And the superintendent of the said custom house shall act as commissioner and disbursing agent of the same.

This amendment proposes to grant $350,000 to continue the work on the custom-house at New Orleans, on which $2,675,000 have already been expended. If it should pass, $3,025,000 will have been granted for building the custom-house at New Orleans. This is a most extraordinary expenditure. The custom-house at New York cost $900,000; the custom-house at Boston $1,100,000; and here is an expenditure for New Orleans that will amount, if this amendment be adopted, to $3,025,000, and the report says it will cost $3,228,000 to complete it. I find that there is a commissioner and disbursing agent appointed at a salary of $6,000 a year; and that $6,000 a year of the money appropriated to build this custom-house is used for what seems to be no service at all. There is a superintendent with a salary of ten dollars per day, amounting to $3,650 a year. The superintendent can act as commissioner and as disbursing agent for that building, and I think there is more fitness that he should, than that anybody else should be appointed. Your officer, Captain Meigs, employed on this Capitol, and in the construction of the aqueduct to this city, at a salary of about two thousand eight hundred dollars a year, acts as superintendent and disbursing agent. Two years ago this last month, Mr. Guthrie discontinued the payment of eight dollars a day for a commissioner of this building. Mr. Penn, of Louisiana, was commissioner and disbursing agent at sixteen dollars a day—$6,000 a year. Mr. Guthrie discontinued, in April, 1856, the pay as commissioner, and this gentleman was allowed eight dollars a day as disbursing agent, which amounts to $3,000 a year. In April, 1857, Mr. Cobb restored the pay to the commissioner, and reappointed this gentleman with a salary of $6,000 a year as commissioner and disbursing agent.

Now, sir, the expenditures upon this custom-house have exceeded all bounds. There is no justification for it; and if it existed in any other portion of the country we should have a storm of denunciation about the extravagant appropriations expended there. Is it necessary to employ a man at $6,000 a year to pay out the money that is appropriated for this building? Surely, sir, there is no necessity for it. Put the duty on the superintendent, and it will not cost you a dollar.

Besides, we have employed in New Orleans, in the marine hospital, a gentleman at a salary of $3,000 a year as disbursing agent. I intend, if this motion carries, to move a similar amendment to the appropriation for the marine hospital. It seems to me that the superintendents on these buildings can disburse the sums appropriated for them, and thus save the Treasury $9,000 a year; and in the present condition of the Treasury, and considering the enormous expenditures that have been made there, I think it our duty to do it; and therefore I hope this amendment will be adopted. I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. SLIDELL. I think it will be found that the discharge of the duties of superintendents of the various buildings being erected throughout the country, and those of the disbursing officers, has always been conferred upon different individuals. I think I cannot be mistaken in making that assertion in the most unqualified manner. It is not peculiar to New Orleans. I do not think any expenditure has been made for the purpose of erecting custom-houses or post offices in any part of the country in which this distinction has not been made. I am not aware that both of these duties have been imposed on the same individual in any part of the United States. Therefore, that portion of the charge of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts falls to the ground.

In relation to the double pay received by Mr. Penn, I can only say that it continued throughout the whole period of the preceding Administration, with the exception of a very few months towards its close. What the particular reason was at that moment for cutting off the emoluments of Mr. Penn, I shall not pretend to say. The fact was so, however. He had been in receipt of those two allowances for years; and he is one of the most faithful disbursing officers of the country. I would state one peculiarity in relation to the employment of officers of this sort in Louisiana, which probably does not exist in any other part of the United States. Our climate is such as to require imperatively the occasional absence of the employes of the Government from their post for the good of their health. This is one of the most important works in the country. The superintendent of the custom-house is Major Beauregard, one of the most distinguished officers in the engineer corps. He for many years has been in rather infirm health, and it has been occasionally found absolutely necessary, on the advice of his physicians, that he should be absent for several months. During that period there was no person to whom he could confide the duties which devolved upon him by his office. Taking into view all these facts, the Secretary of the Treasury thought it proper that the gentleman who is charged with the disbursing of the public moneys there, the payments made on account of the custom-house, and who was obliged during many months of the year to devote a large portion of his time to the superintendency of the building, should be allowed something for his additional services.

In relation to Mr. La Sere, I will state, that, so far from being overpaid, in comparison with other officers throughout the country, he does not receive what is considered a fair and just compensation. Mr. La Sere is the disbursing officer, not only for the marine hospital in New Orleans, involving an expenditure of some $400,000 or $500,000 altogether, but for repairs of the mint, for which, at various times, appropriations have been made to the extent of $130,000 or $140,000. Mr. La Sere received this appointment last spring, on the occurrence of a vacancy by the death of the previous incumbent. He accepted the position as the disbursing officer for the marine hospital, and gave bond for a very large amount for the faithful discharge of that duty. Previous to that time, I think there had been a separate disbursing agent for the mint, who was receiving his regular allowance of eight dollars a day. I am not so very confident in asserting this fact; however, I believe it to be true. After he received his commission and appointment, and was in discharge of his duties, a vacancy having occurred in the place of the disbursing officer of the mint, the Secretary of the Treasury appointed Mr. La Sere to discharge also the duties of disbursing officer of the mint. He was obliged to give a separate bond for the proper discharge of the duties of that office. The Secretary of the Treasury, with a degree of rigor which I believe has been applied to no other part of the country, refused to allow Mr. La Sere any additional compensation for this additional labor. I think I have disposed of that case.

Now, as the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts does not touch at all the question of the propriety of this appropriation of $300,000, it will not be necessary for me to enter into a long explanation of the condition of the custom-house, and the immense cost of that building. I will state, however, that this probably is the largest public building in the United States, with the single exception of the Capitol. Its foundations have been very massive. They were necessarily so from the character of the soil. It covers an area of some four hundred feet by three hundred. The former Secretary of War, probably, can give the exact dimensions of the ground, the block which it covers. That ground was made a donation by the city of New Orleans, for the purpose of having that custom-house erected. If a similar extent of ground, in an equally advantageous position, had been necessary to be acquired by the Government in any other city of the Union, I venture to say it could not have been purchased, or it would not have been purchased, for less than $2,000,000. That was a most munificent donation on the part of the city of New Orleans. I suppose that had some influence with the Secretary of the Treasury in the plans which he adopted for the erection of this building. He considered that so munificent a donation required, in some degree, a corresponding disbursement on the part of the General Government. Had the same building been required in New York, in a corresponding position, I venture to say the ground could not have been acquired for less than $4,000,000, and that the whole expense would have been six or seven millions.

Now, as to another error of fact on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts. He says that the custom-house at New York cost but $1,000,000. I have here a statement of the estimated cost, prepared by the construction department of the Treasury, of the custom-house building, and I presume it is the custom-house building proper in the city of New York, and it is $2,000,000; so that on this point the Senator made a slight mistake of one half. Everybody admits that the custom-house at New York is totally insufficient for the wants of that great commercial metropolis. It ought to be three times as large as it is. But in addition to that, at this moment the General Government is paying for occupation of various buildings, among others, a large portion of the assay office there, in interest upon the capital or, in the actual form of rent, some sixty or seventy thousand dollars, representing, at six per cent., an additional capital of one million or one million two hundred thousand dollars. At the same time the accommodations for the discharge of business are totally inadequate in New York, as everybody knows.

As regards abuses of the Government, I will not pretend to say exactly under whose Administration these things occurred; but I know very well that during the whole period employed in the construction of the custom-house in New York three commissioners were employed by the Government at eight dollars a day in the discharge of these duties; and I think it will be found that under this Administration, and under all past Administrations, there has been no more economical disbursement of the public money than in New Orleans, in the employment of officers to whom this branch of the service has been confided. As regards the custom-house in New Orleans, it has been a very expensive building. There are various reasons, one or two of which I have enumerated before. The character of the soil required a foundation such as had not been known in any other part of the country. Besides, instead of employing the material which might have been found on the spot, pursuing a policy which has never met with my concurrence, the General Government has derived every material for that custom-house from the North. The granite comes from New Hampshire; the iron from Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey; and so far as our mechanics are concerned in New Orleans, they have derived no advantage at all from this vast expenditure; but as it seems to be admitted that the main object of this particular section is not objectionable, I shall say nothing more upon that subject. It may, however, be proper to state that this sum of $300,000 is the lowest possible sum which could have been required by the Secretary of the Treasury to provide for the fulfillment of existing contracts. If this appropriation be not made, the men who have delivered and are now delivering the granite of New Hampshire, the iron of New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania, cannot be paid; and I would suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that if he were to strike out this appropriation he would probably affect his own constituents much more than mine.

Mr. GREEN. I have not a word to say against Mr. La Sere, or any other disbursing agent in the city of New Orleans, or elsewhere. I know Mr. La Sere personally, and what I know of him is all to his honor. He is a high-minded, honorable gentleman, worthy of the position; but I really think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts just and proper. There is no uniform rule in the United States with regard to disbursing agents in making payments for public works. At a majority of the ports where custom-houses, post offices, and court-houses, are being built, the customs' officer is made the disbursing agent, without any compensation for it; and I think that very wise and very proper. There is no uniform law as to the number of supervisors of the building. There is always a local architect, and must of necessity be, to conduct the building, and see that its parts are all properly adjusted. There is generally a superintendent to see that all is carried on according to contract. That may be proper; but when contracts are made and amounts are to be paid out in large sums, there can be no necessity for a separate disbursing agent to make the payments in fulfillment of the contract. If it be a percentage, it is paid in large amounts, from $25,000, or $30,000, or $50,000 at a time. The contractor pays the day laborers; he pays for materials, &c., and therefore it is not necessary to keep a multiplicity of accounts. The superintendent can do it without any very serious hardship. I would suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts an amendment of his proposition. Whoever is the disbursing agent, ought to be under bond and security, and he ought to put that provision to it. Let the Secretary require the requisite security to protect the interests of the Government of the United States; then dispense with all supernumerary officers, in doing which we injure no public service. We do not strike at the custom-house in the city of New Orleans; we are willing to let the appropriation go as it ought; but let the money be applied to the purpose. Do not abstract $6,000 of it in payment of the salary of an officer who can be dispensed with, and his duties imposed upon another, without any injury to the public service. I shall vote for the amendment, but I suggest the modification I have indicated.

Mr. SLIDELL. The Senator from Missouri is altogether mistaken about the fact of the buildings in New Orleans—I do not know how it may be in other parts of the country—being conducted exclusively on the contract system. The contracts, as I said before, are made for the iron and for the granite; the laborers are employed by the Government, and paid by it. The pay roll includes some five or six hundred men, who are paid off by the week, and the disbursing officer is obliged to attend to the payment of each of them.

Mr. HAMLIN. The amendment now pending, offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, is an amendment to an amendment; and I cannot, therefore, offer any additional amendment to it; but I will read one which I think appropriate, and I suggest it to the Senator from Massachusetts to adopt it as a portion of his amendment:

And in all cases where there is a superintendent for the erection of public buildings, he shall act as disbursing agent, and shall give bonds for the faithful discharge of his duties.

That makes it general. I do not know, sir, that there is any evil in the administration of our Government which can be corrected by the Senate; but if there is any, it would seem to me that this is one which should be examined into and be corrected by the Senate. The Senator from Missouri is mistaken when he says that all the custom-houses now in process of erection are done under contract. A few—the New Orleans and Charleston custom-houses—were begun before the system of contracts was adopted by the Department. Perhaps there are none other than these two which are not erected under a system of contracts.

Mr. PUGH. There are three or four.

Mr. HAMLIN. But the great number are being constructed under a system of contracts. On referring to the Finance Report for last year, I find at page 129 a list of all the custom-houses, court-houses, and marine hospitals, that are in process of erection, and I find there that uniformly in every case they have a superintendent whose pay varies all the way from four to six, eight, and ten dollars per day; and they have also at each and every place a separate disbursing agent. I think that if we examine this simple table that is before us, we shall learn where a very considerable portion of the moneys that have been appropriated for the erection of public buildings has gone to. I find, too, that in very many cases the disbursing agents are the collectors of the port. I do not understand by what authority of law they are allowed to act as disbursing agents, receiving additional compensation for that service. The chairman of the Committee on Finance knows better than I do what is the law; but, as I understand it, no person in the employ of the Government, who receives a fixed salary, can receive compensation for discharging the duties of another officer. I do not know but that that provision of the law is confined to Army and Navy officers; but I think it is general. If, however, it does not apply to civil officers it ought to apply to them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will my colleague allow me to make a statement?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As to Army officers, I know that while the custom-house and marine hospital were in process of construction at Portland, eight dollars a day was paid to Lieutenant Franklin as superintendent, and he was at the same time, as he is now, an officer of the Army. He was then employed as superintendent of light-houses out there, for which also he received pay. He received eight dollars a day continuously, being an officer of the Army—four dollars for each building as superintendent.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is some such provision of law certainly applicable to some classes of officers. Now, let me call the attention of the Senate to the table to which I have alluded. I have it before me; and I commence with my own State, with which I am familiar, and know something about. In Bath they are erecting a custom-house, and T. G. Stockbridge is superintendent, and Joseph Berry, who is the collector of the port, is disbursing agent. Stockbridge receives four dollars a day, and Berry four hundred dollars a year for this service, in addition to his pay as collector. I think a superintendent of such a building ought to be a practical mechanic. In running my eye over the list in regard to Maine—and there are five works in process of construction there—I do not see a single one who is a mechanic. Still, waiving that objection, these superintendents do not occupy beyond a single hour in the day, and probably not more than one hour in the week, in this service. The custom-house officer, who is also disbursing agent, receives pay as the disbursing agent in addition to his compensation as collector. I believe every disbursing agent in my State is a custom-house officer—Berry, Smart, Jones, Leavitt, Macdonald, and Kennedy—every one of them. At the end of the week, or only perhaps at the end of the month, they pay out money, or give checks for the money which is due to the operatives or contractors. It may take two or three hours in a month; and they receive their four hundred dollars per annum for this service.

I submit to the Senate that this is a state of things which ought to be arrested. It is only for the purpose of sustaining, in many cases, mere political partisans. I have nothing to say in relation to the case in New Orleans. I know both the gentlemen in office there, whose names have been mentioned; and I know them to be highly respectable gentlemen. I have nothing to say against them individually; but I affirm that this system abstracts from the Treasury a large amount of money, for no adequate service rendered. Take the case in New Orleans. How much time does it take the disbursing agent who disburses the money there? Does it take him one day in a week? I do not believe it takes more than one day in a month.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will answer that question. I happen to be in the custom-house very often, and I know that the duties of the superintendent and disbursing officer are of such a character as to require their constant presence. They are always in the building; and you may find them there every day in the year, from nine o'clock until four, unless they are absent on account of indisposition.

Mr. HAMLIN. I presume that is so, as the Senator says so. I only say that there is not a particle of necessity for the disbursing agent ever treading the threshold of the building. All he does is to pay out the money when he gets the proper vouchers on which to pay it. He may go there and spend all of his time, if he pleases; I only say there is nothing about the discharge of his duties that requires him to go there at all.

Now, one word in relation to making the superintendents disbursing agents. They are the best officers for it. They ought to know better, they do know better, to whom the money is to be paid. They are the persons who superintend the erection of the building, and they only know how far it has progressed, what sums are due, and how far the contract is completed. It must be on the certificate of the superintendent that the disbursing officer pays. He is just the man who is, by his position, qualified, and knows just when and how much to pay. The small duty of paying out money would not be a great addition to his labor. If, however, it should require a trivial addition to the compensation already received by the superintendent, make that addition; but I do not believe there is a superintendent who does not receive an ample compensation for both superintending and disbursing.

I have no feeling in this matter. I do not imagine it is going to commend itself to the Senate; but in these days when you are talking about retrenchment, in these days when we are all looking at the enormous expenditures that are made, if there is a place where the pruning-knife can be applied, this is one; and I think it is one where it ought to be applied. I do not know where or when this system originated; I never knew of its existence until I saw it here. I can only say, however, it exists, wherever it came from; it has probably grown up gradually; and I would act and vote at any time, and at all times, precisely as I mean to do now, because I believe, in my heart, the thing is right, and ought to be done. I should not vote to make New Orleans an exceptional case; I do not understand why it should be so; but I will vote to put them all on the same footing. I will vote to make every superintendent of any of these buildings the disbursing officer, and I think we ought to do that.

Mr. CLAY. I shall vote for this amendment; but I would rather vote for one dispensing with all these disbursing agents.

Mr. KING and others. Make it that.

Mr. CLAY. I will prepare an amendment, if I have time, for that purpose. I think that these officers are entirely supernumerary, and that we may dispense with them. I remember that during the last Congress there came before the Committee on Commerce a memorial from the collector of Charleston—I think it was Mr. Colcock—asking a very small percentage, one or two per cent., upon money which he had disbursed as agent of the Government there. It was submitted to Mr. Guthrie, then Secretary of the Treasury, and, in reply, he very promptly said that the claim was without any just foundation, either in law or in equity. He said that it was the collector's duty to disburse as well as to collect the moneys of the Government, and the committee reported against the claim.

Amongst other objections that I have to this system, any man who will run his eye over the report and see the rates of compensation allowed at different places, will perceive that it appears to be governed rather by favoritism than by the expense of living at these places. For instance, let me call attention to the compensation in Maine. At the various custom-houses there the disbursing officer gets his $400 per annum; but in New Hampshire, at Portsmouth, Mr. Hatch is allowed five dollars a day. I do not know whether they include Sundays, or whether they include every day in the week except Sunday; but from what the Senator from Louisiana says, I suppose you may count at least six days in the week. Then he gets over fifteen hundred dollars per annum salary for doing what is required to be done in the State of Maine for $400. Looking further down, I find that the disbursing agent at Providence gets six dollars a day, which is more than eighteen hundred dollars per annum, for the same service obtained in Maine for $400 per annum. Then, when I come to the southern custom-houses, I find that the disbursing agent in Mobile is the collector of the port, (Mr. Sanford,) and there appears to be allowed him, in addition to his compensation as collector, the sum of $400 as disbursing agent; but in New Orleans, where the cost of living is not higher, Mr. Penn gets sixteen dollars per day, or upwards of six thousand dollars a year, for performing the same service.

The inequality of this system, it seems to me, will strike every man in the Senate. And if the collector at Charleston was forced to disburse a very large amount, for which he was refused all compensation whatever, the then Secretary of the Treasury maintaining that it was his duty to disburse as well as to collect moneys, upon the order of the Government, why, I ask, should we pay $6,000 to an agent in New Orleans for performing this service? I think it is an unnecessary and superfluous expense—one that we might well dispense with; and I shall vote for an amendment to strike out all appropriations for every one of these disbursing agents, and require the duty to be performed by the collectors. I do this at the same time with a consciousness that I am disobliging, perhaps, a friend and constituent of my own—Mr. Sanford—whom I esteem very highly, as a gentleman and a good citizen; but I think we ought to reduce the expenditures of the Government as much as possible, and I do not doubt that there are a large number of supernumeraries in all the collection districts, and that these disbursing agents may be very well dispensed with.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Louisiana tells us that superintendents are not appointed as disbursing agents. I know that it is not usual to do so, but that is no reason why it should not be done. The power of appointing disbursing agents is exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury. I offered a resolution the other day, which was adopted by the Senate, calling on the Secretary for the authority by which these appointments were made, and his answer has been received. The Senator from Louisiana, however, is mistaken in the fact. There are a few such cases. I find that at Pensacola, in Florida, the superintendent is disbursing agent; and at Natchez, in Mississippi, and Napoleon, in Arkansas, the superintendent is disbursing agent. Here, in the District of Columbia, on the Treasury building, Mr. Bowman is superintendent and disbursing agent. There is also a case in Louisiana returned, where Mr. Duncan acts in both capacities. Now, I see no reason why the superintendents of these buildings should not act as disbursing agents in all cases. I believe the duty of disbursing the moneys appropriated for the erection of these buildings can be performed without any additional cost to the Government by the superintendents, and better performed than they can be by any other persons who may be appointed.

I find in the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance, an item of $300,000 for continuing the custom-house at Charleston, South Carolina. That, with the appropriations heretofore made, makes $2,300,000 for that custom-house at a port where they collect about half a million of revenue per annum. I think it is a very unwise and unnecessary expenditure for a city of that size. I find that the collector of the port of Charleston, at a compensation of only $400 a year in addition to his salary as collector, acts as disbursing agent, and we propose to appropriate $300,000 for that custom-house, and $365,000 for New Orleans. Why cannot the superintendent at ten dollars a day in Charleston—for I find that the superintendent there has ten dollars a day—act as disbursing agent?

Mr. HAYNE. I will tell you why. He is an engineer, and I am very much mistaken if he does not enter into all the contracts; and if he were disbursing agent besides, there would be no check on him. The collector receives the funds, and he is accountable. He gives ample security. Many of the superintendents would not do it. I do not think it would be proper to make the superintendent the disbursing agent.

Mr. WILSON. I disagree with the honorable Senator from South Carolina, and I see no reason why that gentleman, receiving $3,650 a year should not disburse the money necessary to be disbursed at Charleston, and give bonds to the Government for the faithful discharge of the duty. Therefore, without applying this amendment specially to this case, I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, and am willing to take his amendment as it has been modified.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that it would be safer to have the collector the disbursing agent. The superintendent is very often a mere architect.

Mr. HAYNE. The superintendent is daily at his post. As the honorable gentleman from Louisiana has said, he is always there; and, if I mistake not, he makes all the contracts. At any rate, he is always at his post, and the office is exceedingly overous.

Mr. CLAY. I have prepared an amendment, which I think will cover the object of the Senator from Massachusetts. It is to insert this provision as an additional section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That the collectors of customs in the several collection districts of the United States shall be, and they are hereby and hereafter, required to act as disbursing agents for the payment of all moneys appropriated for the building of custom-houses, marine hospitals, or other public buildings; and that hereafter disbursing agents and the clerks of disbursing agents shall be dispensed with.

Mr. WILSON. I certainly have no objection to that form. I understand it meets the approbation of the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HUNTER. I will vote for it. I do not understand the subject very well, but I know that the superintendents are frequently mere architects, and it would not do to make them disbursing agents. We know that the collectors are safe disbursing agents.

Mr. FESSENDEN. One difficulty about this amendment is that some of the public buildings are erected at places where there are no collectors of customs. For instance, you do not always erect a court-house in a place where there is a collector.

Mr. HUNTER. The buildings are for custom-houses and court-houses together.

Mr. FESSENDEN. All I want is to make the provision broad enough to cover all these buildings in the United States.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Virginia wish to have the collectors made disbursing agents. The Senator from Maine suggests that this cannot be done in all cases. Now why not say, "collectors or superintendents." There may be a few cases where a superintendent would act in that way, and, if the Senator from Alabama will agree to that modification, I will accept his amendment.

Mr. CLAY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would suggest another thing, to add to the amendment, that he shall receive no additional compensation for the discharge of these duties.

Mr. CLAY. I shall be sure to do that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If you do not do it, they will go on and give them eight dollars a day additional.

Mr. PUGH. If Senators had looked at the end of this table, on page 132 of the Finance Report, they would have found a note answering some of their objections:

"NOTE. Those disbursing agents whose rate of compensation is stated at $400 per annum are collectors, whose compensation is fixed at two and a half per cent. on the amount disbursed; provided such percentage, in addition to the percentage received for light-house and all other disbursements, does not exceed four hundred dollars per annum. Generally, where there is a collector at the location of a work, he is appointed disbursing agent; but at New Orleans, and a few other places, a separate disbursing agent is employed."

I think the cheapest plan would be to make them all collectors where there is one, and to bring him under the $400 provision, which is a mere additional per centum to his compensation. He does not get that, unless the percentage amounts to it; it is a limitation. Where there is no collector, I have no great objection to appointing a superintendent; but when I look over this column, I see that many of these superintendents are Army officers, and I do not want to give them any more power.

Mr. HUNTER. There is a law in regard to designating depositories. If a collector be designated as a depository, he receives a certain per centum, so much on the $100,000. I suppose it is under that law they get the $400 alluded to; but I am not certain of that. I think it probable, from hearing this note read, that it is under that law that the collectors get it.

Mr. PUGH. I will vote for an amendment to make the collector a disbursing agent, wherever there is a collector.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Alabama is preparing his amendment as a separate section.

Mr. CLAY. If the Senate will go on and perfect this bill, I shall endeavor, in the mean time, to compass the views of all gentlemen, by writing an amendment which shall be a concluding section of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. STUART in the chair.) Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his amendment with that understanding?

Mr. WILSON. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON. I find in this amendment an item of $300,000, for continuing the work on the custom-house at Charleston, South Carolina. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance, if that is necessary? I find in a report made by Captain Bowman, a statement that $100,000 is needed. I am willing to vote whatever is necessary.

Mr. HUNTER. I am assured by Captain Bowman—I saw him this morning—that this sum is necessary, and it is all for material, except so much labor as will be necessary to put up the material when it gets there, and not leave it exposed to the weather. That is the explanation made to me.

Mr. HAYNE. The custom-house in Charleston is in a peculiar condition. It is not near so far advanced as the New Orleans custom-house; and, unless you make an appropriation sufficient to use up the material, a great deal of it will be destroyed. The proper kind of mechanics have been collected. It is a beautiful building, a very costly one, and if you discharge your good workmen you may not be able to get them again.

The amendment was agreed to.

The last reported amendment of the committee was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That section six of an act passed August 18, 1856, entitled "An act making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government, for the year ending 30th of June, 1857," shall apply to the subsistence of the commissioner therein named from the time he entered upon the discharge of his duties, and the same shall be paid out of appropriations already made.

Mr. PUGH. What commissioner is that? I dislike this voting in the dark.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Maine can explain.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is the commissioner under the reciprocity treaty for fixing the line agreed upon; and if the Senator wants an explanation of the necessity of the provision, I will give it to him. The salary of the commissioner was originally fixed at $2,000. It was supposed at the time the salary was fixed that he would receive, in addition to it, his expenses. His expenses have necessarily been, for several years, more than his salary, and the amount to pay them was not appropriated because it was supposed to be covered by the previous legislation. It was discovered by my colleague, however, that that was not provided for, and he suggested it to the Secretary of State, who admitted at once its propriety, but said he had no authority, under the act, to pay the expenses, and an allowance must be made him for subsistence, at four dollars a day. It was made two years ago. It was supposed, at the time, that this provision was made for the preceding years—that it covered the year which had elapsed; but on examination it has been found that although it applied to that year, and all succeeding years, and has since been regularly estimated for, it did not apply to the first year. There is money out of which the payment can be made already appropriated, and this proposition is simply to give him his subsistence for the first year, which he has never received.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I offer another amendment from the Committee on Finance, to insert at the end of the first section:

To enable the Library Committee to complete the payments for a series of portraits of the Presidents of the United States, contracted for under authority of Congress, and for framing the same, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I offer another amendment:

For paying the expenses of the commissioners appointed in pursuance of the joint resolution of the 24th of February, 1857, to inquire into, and testing the processes of J. T. Barclay, for preventing the counterfeiting of the coins of the United States, in addition to the sum appropriated by said resolution, $800.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it $1,200 for Dr. Barclay. The commissioners who have tested these experiments under a resolution I introduced at the last session, speak very favorably of them, and they state in their report, which I handed to the chairman of the Finance Committee, that Mr. Barclay had been attending during the whole progress of the experiments, and they turned out advantageously to the country in testing the means discovered by him to prevent counterfeiting. They recommend that his expenses at least be paid, and they say $1,200 would be right for them. I hope the Senate will agree to add $1,200 for Mr. Barclay's expenses.

Mr. HUNTER. Eight hundred dollars is for machinery to test the improvement. The Committee on Finance agreed to the sum of $800 for machinery.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move to add $1,200 for the expenses of Dr. Barclay. He is a gentleman, without means, who has attended to this business. It is likely to be advantageous to the Government. So the commissioners report—two scientific gentlemen who have considered the matter; and I think it is but fair to allow the old man his expenses while giving his labor. I propose to amend the amendment by adding to it—

And $1,200 to the said J. T. Barclay, for payment of his expenses while attending at the Mint for that purpose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This commission was originally appointed at the request of Dr. Barclay, for the purpose of testing an invention which he alleged he had made. It had not then been tested; he had not the means to do it himself, and therefore he applied to Congress to furnish him with the means. If it turns out to be successful it will be very valuable; if unsuccessful, of course it will be worth nothing. He being deeply interested in the matter, asked for, and obtained the assistance of, the Government to test his experiment. We have paid the expenses of the commission, for which purpose a sum was appropriated; I do not know how much.

Mr. TOOMBS. Two thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The commissioners have been acting; they now say that they think, from present appearances, the discovery will turn out to be advantageous, and they need $800 more to enable them to complete the examination; and they recommend that as Dr. Barclay has given his time to aid them, $1,200 should be appropriated for his use. The question then is, whether Congress will only pay the expenses of making the experiment, which will be advantageous to Dr. Barclay if successful, and stop there, or whether they will also go further, and pay his expenses while it was being made. It is very evident that if it turns out to be unsuccessful the expenses of the experiment will have been paid by the Government, and they will get no benefit from it. If it turns out to be successful, this man will have all the benefit of the examination and experiment which have been carried on at the expense of the Government. The question is whether Congress will pay his expenses in addition to trying his experiment at their expense.

Mr. TOOMBS. This is a small matter, but the Senator from Maine does not state it quite fairly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I certainly intend to do so.

Mr. TOOMBS. I know you intend it, but you do not state all the facts of the case. From the nature of the discovery, it is of no use to any body but the Government. He has tested it himself, so as to be satisfied of his theory, and the commissioners seem to be satisfied with it. If it turns out to be a great advantage to the currency of the country, as he supposes, Congress will allow just as much compensation as they may consider him entitled to for the benefit of the country. It is not a thing the man can use as private property, in any shape or form; for it is an invention in regard to coining, to prevent counterfeiting by the various modes in which modern science has aided it. He cannot sell it to anybody but the Government.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Still it is settled to be a matter of so much consequence to this Government, if it turns out successfully, that, as a matter of necessity, the Government will avail themselves of it; and unquestionably, if they do, they will pay him liberally.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Government will pay what they think it is worth. All we ask now is to allow him his expenses while he was assisting the Government officers in testing the matter. The old gentleman came to me more than two years ago, and showed me his process; and I thought it was very worthy of public attention, and would be of immense advantage to the public in preventing counterfeiting. The matter has been tested by a scientific commission appointed by the Government, who recommended the payment of $1,200—his expenses in attending at the Mint in Philadelphia. It is a small matter; and I hope the money will be voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope there will be no objection to this amendment. Though the improvement may be very valuable, and the man may get a fair price for it when it is done, you should give him enough to live on while the experiment is going on.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not believe in that. I want the Senate to understand the matter fairly. If the principle applies to Dr. Barclay, it applies to anybody else who comes forward and says he has something very valuable to the Government. I have heard gentlemen on this floor object over and over again against the Government being at the expense of trying experiments to test the value of inventions and discoveries, which inventors might say would be of advantage to the Government. Here is a case where the Government has not only gone to the expense, saving him the necessity and consequent expense of testing it; that is to say, of proving to a certainty that it would be valuable; making the experiment at its own cost, but where he calls on us in addition to that to pay him for his own time in attending to what is to be very important to him as well as to the Government if it succeeds. My own constitutional difficulties on such subjects are not great, but I would suggest to gentlemen who are rather apt to present such objections on occasions like this, that I think this is a very good case for them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know that if this experiment succeeds, it must be for the benefit of the Government, and the inventor will not have more than we choose to give him anyhow. He has got so far with it as to satisfy the scientific men that it is likely to be successful. So far he has gone without bread; and when he gets to that point, to obtain a recommendation in his favor from them, I think we can afford to pay him enough to live.

Mr. DAVIS. From the statement of the case—and I know nothing except from the statement here—I think it was wrong in its inception, and the further we go the more wrong it will be. If the Government is to undertake, from the public Treasury, to make experiments upon everything which an inventor may bring, we shall have not only a necessity for a home valuation, but for an increase of duties in addition, to provide the means; and if every inventor who has something which he says will be useful to the Government, and nobody else, is to have experiments made because he suggests it, and is to be supported while the experiments go on, we have not Treasury enough, and the country never will have Treasury enough to conduct the experiments. It has been the practice of this Government, save where Congress intervened and directed otherwise in special cases, to require every one who suggested that he had discovered or invented something, to bring it to its practical test, to present it in a form fit for use, and then to subject it to experiment and see whether it was valuable or not; in order that the Government might take it if good, and reject it if bad. During the late war in Europe, the inventive genius of the country seemed to be particularly excited on the subject of improvements in arms; and if the United States had undertaken to make all the experiments upon various arms, and particularly upon cannon, which would be of no use in any private enterprise, and the various modifications of fortification suggested by men who had no knowledge, who had not learned even the elements of the subject on which they claimed to teach, the amount appropriated for fortification would have been but a mite compared to the sum required for the expenditures. I think the Government has acted generously, even more generously than wisely, in undertaking to conduct experiments in relation to these inventions; and clearly the inventors should be held to support themselves while the experiment is going on, if that be the only check you intend to interpose between the Treasury and those men whose minds are busy in suggesting things they cannot themselves carry out.

Mr. TOOMBS. The remarks made by the Senator from Mississippi have no sort of application to the case; and the Senator states that he did not know of it before it was brought up. This gentleman, who is a scientific man, had demonstrated upon scientific principles that there was a mode of preventing the counterfeiting of the coin of the country, the abrasion and deterioration of it, and detecting a great many scientific means which were used for the purpose of deteriorating, or abrading, or otherwise lessening the value of the currency. He demonstrated to those competent to judge of it, that his system would do this; and he proposed that the Government should make coin on these principles for itself. It is of no value to anybody else. The Government appointed two of the most scientific men who could be selected to test it. They approve the process, and say the discovery is what he declared it was. The matter has been tested at the Mint at the small cost of $2,500—about three per cent. of the entire gold and silver coin in the United States now in circulation is counterfeited. It is a matter of vast importance to the country. Scientific men were appointed to inquire into the matter, and test whether it was of value. If not, the Government lost nothing; if it turned out to be of value, the Government would make a great deal. The discovery was complete, and the action of the Government was only putting it in practical operation for its use. Nobody else wanted it. It was of no use to him. He could not "coin money," or "regulate the value thereof." It is not like the case of an ordinary invention of fire-arms, which the party has a direct interest in, and he merely requires mechanical means to put it into operation. The Government alone was interested in this matter; and it is a question whether the old man shall have the $1,200 while he was attending upon experiments of the Government? It is not worth five minutes, nor these speeches, and, therefore, I will not detain the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. The principle is worth more than five minutes; and I will show that my remarks had more application than the Senator's answer. He says it is of no value. If it is of no value, why give ten cents for it?

Mr. TOOMBS. I said it was of no value, except to the Government. The discoverer cannot coin money.

Mr. DAVIS. If it succeeds, and answers the purposes of the Government, it will become the property of the Government only on paying for it.

Mr. TOOMBS. On their own terms.

Mr. DAVIS. Then they are to pay if it succeeds.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes; I have stated the case fully.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Government have not the right to use it, in the event it succeeds, then I say they are incurring expenditures for his benefit. If they cannot use it without paying him for it, it is his property. Though it is clear he cannot coin money in the United States, or regulate the value thereof, yet, if he discovers something which will effect all that is described by the Senator from Georgia, what is to prevent him from selling it to other Governments, as well as to this Government? Inventors, when they come forward and ask the Government to make their experiments, not very unfrequently say, "if you will make the experiment, you shall have the use of the invention to any extent the Government requires; all I desire is, the right to sell this elsewhere; if the Government will make the experiment, I will agree that the Government shall have a right to use it free of all charge." Here is a case where it seems the Government is to pay for the right to use that which they themselves perfect. It is but one of the multitude of cases where men have opinions or crude notions; they may be sound or unsound; the judgment of the savans who have examined it may prove correct or incorrect; but, in any event, the Government is to bear the expense; and in any event, if the Government uses the discovery it has to pay for it.

Mr. MALLORY. I will ask the Senator from Georgia, for information simply, whether there is any report from the experts of the value of this, and whether it has really succeeded?

Mr. TOOMBS. I stated that there was; and these very experts recommend the payment of the $1,200. They say that, as far as they have gone, they believe it will be of great value to the country; and it is on their recommendation that the amendment is offered for the very sum they propose to pay this man for his expenses.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, there were, on a division—yeas 12, nays 13—no quorum voting.

Mr. DAVIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GREEN. I move that the Senate adjourn. The motion was not agreed to.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HUNTER. Let us go through with these amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Florida that, in the present condition of things, his motion cannot be put. There was no quorum voting on the last motion. The Secretary will call the roll on the amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Bigler, Broderick, Clingman, Collamer, Dixon, Durkee, Fout, Gwin, Harlan, Hayne, Houston, Rice, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Toombs, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Bright, Brown, Chandler, Clay, Davis, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Green, Hamlin, Hammond, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Mason, Pearce, Pugh, Reid, Stidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, and Wright—23.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The committee's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I propose another amendment from the Finance Committee:

For printing ordered by the Senate and House of Representatives during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and paper for the same, $50,000.

For binding documents ordered to be printed by the House of Representatives during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and for engravings, lithographs, and electrotypes for the same, $123,000.

For binding documents ordered to be printed by the Senate during the Thirty-Third and Thirty-Fourth Congresses, and for engravings, lithographs, and electrotypes for the same, $113,000.

This is the result of an examination directed by the House of Representatives into the documents which have been ordered to be printed. At the commencement of the session there was a deficiency bill introduced for printing which failed in the House of Representatives, because they were unwilling to vote as much money as it would take to carry out the previous orders of the House and Senate for printing books. The subject was referred to their committee, who made a report, in which they recommended a curtailment of the documents which had been ordered, a diminution of the number of volumes, and the number of copies of particular volumes. That report was concurred in by a very large majority of the House, I think four fifths. When they concurred in it, they referred it, by order, to the Committee of Ways and Means, that it might become a subject of legislation in this bill; but the bill had passed from that committee, and they sent it to us. The result is a great saving over the liabilities which would exist if we should print the documents heretofore ordered to be printed. I have before me the report explaining the whole matter; and it can be read, if desired. ["Oh, no!"] Some Senators, I hear, say that they will vote against the amendment. If they do, I wish them to understand that then they will leave existing a large liability for a much larger amount, and will probably involve six or seven hundred thousand dollars. That will be the effect of voting it down.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I have another amendment from the Finance Committee as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That in addition to those now authorized by law, there may be employed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in the office of the Register of the Treasury, an additional clerk of the third class, and in the office of the Treasurer of the United States an additional clerk of the third class; and such sum as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this section to the 30th of June, 1859, is hereby appropriated.

These are the two clerks which were asked for in the loan bill, and which the Senate struck out. I was not then so well informed on the subject as I am now. Since then, I have seen the Secretary of the Treasury, and I am convinced that these clerks are necessary. The state of the case is this: Out of the contingent fund which was given when the Treasury notes were allowed, he employed four temporary clerks. When Congress adjourns, under a standing law, these temporary clerks must be dismissed. He asks to retain two out of the four as permanent clerks; and their services are necessary in order to enable him to execute the act in regard to the Treasury notes, which we know have been issued and are to be reissued, and also to execute the loan bill, if it should pass. I believe it is necessary. They are the only clerks I have voted for this session, or expect to vote for; but I think it would expose the Department to a good deal of inconvenience not to allow them.

Mr. IVERSON. Does the amendment limit the time of their employment?

Mr. HUNTER. It only makes an appropriation up to the end of the next fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I have another amendment:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the act of the 3d of March, 1845, "making appropriations for civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1848," as provides "that no part of the appropriations for the contingent expenses of either House of Congress shall be applied as payment or compensation to any clerk, messenger, or other assistant, employed by resolution of one of the said Houses," be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and that such payments as have been heretofore made to persons so employed, after being approved and certified by the proper committee of either House, shall be allowed at the Treasury.

The explanation of that is this: there are clerks in both Houses who are employed under resolutions of each House; those clerks have been heretofore paid, since the passage of the law of 1845; but the present Comptroller has decided that, under that law, he cannot pay any clerk who has been appointed by mere resolution, out of the contingent fund. This is to repeal so much of the law as interferes with what has been the practice ever since that time, and without which we should not be able to pay many of our employes in both Houses. The accounts of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives have been suspended, or rather the Comptroller has refused to pass them, on that account.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I have only one more amendment from the Finance Committee:

And be it further enacted, That the extra compensation paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to the clerks of committees under the resolution of the 14th March, 1857, be allowed at the Treasury.

That has been refused under this law, and if it were extra compensation would have been properly refused; but I regard it not as extra compensation but as an addition to the salaries of the clerks of committees. We not only added to their salaries but we passed a resolution to pay them for their services during the extra session. Under the law, I believe, they could have been paid nothing without this resolution after the regular session expired, but under the construction of the law these clerks of committees cannot be paid that compensation unless this provision be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have an amendment from the Committee on Finance, which I offer at the request of the Senator from Maryland, a member of the committee, [Mr. PEARCE] who is out at present, but he will be here in a moment. The amendment is:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to complete the digest of the statistics of manufactures according to the returns of the seventh census, $3,500.

Mr. PEARCE. I will state to the Senate that heretofore all the census tables have been completed, and indeed have been published, except those which relate to manufactures. The tables of agriculture, of population, and of vital statistics, have all been completed and published. The tables of manufacturing products have only been completed in part. I think something like twenty or twenty-one States have been completed, and for the rest there are very loose returns, simply sheets. They have not been collated and put in tabular form. The plan originally was to have the tables of all the returns prepared, exhibiting the counties of each State separately. That is not what is now proposed, but simply to prepare the returns so as to show by State sheets the products of manufacturing industry in the different States; nor is it proposed to publish them. We understand that the editors of certain statistical works would be very glad to get the material, if they can be furnished with it, and they can be furnished only by the Government preparing it, for it would not trust it out of its hands, and it will take about three thousand five hundred dollars to do this. It seems to many of us desirable that these tables should be made, that we may have means of comparison between the condition of the country in this respect at the period of the last census, and at the period of the census which is to come. This subject was called to our notice by a letter from the Secretary of the Interior. I admit very frankly that the Secretary does not press the appropriation of the money, but he states that it will require $3,500 to do this work, and he rather thinks it ought to be done. In conversation, he has expressed himself to me more strongly than in the letter. It is a small affair, and I hope the Senate will have no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I have some amendments to offer from the Committee on the District of Columbia. The first is to come in after an amendment of the Committee on Finance, which has already been inserted at line two hundred and two, making an appropriation of $3,000 for the repair of Pennsylvania avenue. My amendment is to insert:

For graveling Pennsylvania avenue from the Capitol enclosure to Eleventh street east, $5,000.

That is Pennsylvania avenue from the Capitol to the Congressional Burying-Ground. I think the Senators who passed over it on a late melancholy occasion must have observed that it was almost in an impassable condition.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to know where this appropriation is to be applied?

Mr. BROWN. On Pennsylvania avenue, east of the Capitol.

Mr. HUNTER. It is hardly necessary, it seems to me.

Mr. BROWN. I have no interest in it beyond anybody else; but the street is almost in an impassable condition. All the improvements on it heretofore have been made by the Government. The city has never taken jurisdiction over it, and Congress has never recognized its right to exercise jurisdiction over it. The estimate was made by the engineer under a resolution.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROWN. I move another amendment from the District Committee, as additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Public Buildings to cause obstructions of every kind to be removed from such streets, avenues, and sidewalks in the city of Washington as have been, or may be hereafter, improved in whole or in part by the United States, and to keep the same, at all times, free from obstructions; and, for this purpose, he shall have power to institute suits in any court having competent jurisdiction in the District of Columbia; and it shall be the duty of the district attorney for said District to prosecute the same; and whenever any person shall desire to remove the paving stones, or to displace any other work done by the authority of the United States, for the purpose of laying gas pipes, or for any other purpose, it shall be the duty of such person to obtain a written permit from the said commissioner; and such persons shall obligate themselves to replace the said work to the satisfaction of the said commissioner, and within such time as he may prescribe.

And be it further enacted, That if any person shall place obstruction in the streets, avenues, or sidewalks aforesaid, such person shall pay the costs of removing the same, and shall, moreover, be subject to a penalty of ten dollars, to be recovered as other debts are recovered in the District of Columbia, for each and every day the said obstruction may remain after the commissioner shall have given notice for its removal. And if any person or persons removing the paving stones or other work done by the authority of the United States, shall fail to replace the same to the satisfaction of the commissioner, within the time presented by him, he or they shall be subject to a penalty of twenty-five dollars for each and every failure, and shall, moreover, pay the costs of replacing the same, the whole to be recovered before any court in the District of Columbia having competent jurisdiction; and that this and the preceding section shall continue in force until repealed by Congress.

These two sections were passed during the last Congress by an almost unanimous vote here; in fact, I believe, entirely unanimous. The explanation is briefly this: Congress every year makes appropriations to repair Pennsylvania avenue, and to make other repairs. Every time people are disposed to put down gas pipes, or to take up the work for any purpose whatever, they do it without any express permission of any one acting under the authority of the United States, and they replace it in a very slovenly way—do the work badly, and the omnibuses and heavy vehicles running over it presently get it all out of repair, and you are called upon to make appropriations to put it in repair. These sections are designed to require the work to be put back again when it is taken up, and to give the Commissioner of Public Buildings the power to require it to be done.

Mr. HUNTER. This is very good legislation. The only objection I have to it is, that it is inappropriate to this bill, and I am afraid to begin with it.

Mr. BROWN. I think not. We are making appropriations to repair Pennsylvania avenue, and I shall move to reconsider the vote by which the appropriations were made unless the work can be protected by this or some other means; for I have seen quite enough of this thing of putting down work and taking it up and replacing it in a slovenly manner.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I have a little amendment to come in at the end of the first section:

For making necessary repairs to the jail in Washington city, and putting venetian blinds to the windows, the sum of $340.

A Senator near me asks me what we have to do with it. We have this to do with it: it contains nobody but the prisoners of the United States; the judges are appointed by the authority of the United States; the prisoners are fed by the United States; the jail was built by the United States. Six hundred and forty dollars of this money is for putting blinds to the windows; not for the accommodation of the prisoners, but to keep them from exposing themselves in an unseemly manner to persons passing in the streets.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I have another amendment to insert at the end of the first section:

For the extension of the court-house portion of the City Hall so as to provide necessary and suitable accommodations for the criminal court of the District of Columbia, $33,000: Provided, That no obligation shall be incurred, or contract entered into, which looks to any increased appropriation by the United States for said purpose.

The appropriation has been recommended by the late Secretary of the Interior, Governor McClelland, and by the present Secretary; has been asked for by all the judges of all the courts in Washington, and has been urged by some half a dozen grand juries. The facts, as I understand them, are these: whenever the circuit court of the District of Columbia, and the criminal court, have to sit at the same time, as frequently happens, one or the other is compelled to adjourn, to give way, for the reason that both sit in the same room. Within the last few months the criminal court has been denied the privilege of holding its sessions, and more than one hundred persons, waiting for trial, have been locked up in jail and fed at the public expense. I suppose there are not less than eighty or one hundred there now. If the criminal court could have a room of its own, where it could hold perpetual sessions if the business required them, this would not be. I trust, therefore, that the amendment will pass.

Mr. HUNTER. At another time, when we were not appropriating so largely as we are to public buildings in Washington city, I would vote for this; but at present, and in view of the appropriations already contained in this bill, and the state of the Treasury, I think we ought to save a little, and let the courts wait.

Mr. BROWN. No one wants to economize more than I do, and I show it by the very meager appropriations I ask for the District. This is the last one we have. Five thousand dollars was voted down a little while ago, and you have given but $800. There is no economy in refusing this appropriation, for the reason, as I said before, that you keep your jail constantly full of prisoners, fed at the public expense, simply because the courts cannot sit for their trial. They cannot sit unless you provide some place for holding the courts. As to asking this city to provide court-houses for the Federal courts, that would be unreasonable. It never has been done, and I suppose never will be.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to say one word in regard to this appropriation, as I did not agree to it in committee; and the reason I did not agree to it was that a few years since we made an appropriation of $30,000 to finish the exterior of the City Hall, and there was contained in that statute an express provision that the city authorities should thereafter furnish the United States courts with all the rooms they required for courts of all kinds in that building. It was fairly made in the shape of a contract, and I am for holding the city to it.

Mr. BROWN. In reply to the Senator from Maine, I will state very briefly certain facts, to which I hope the Senate will listen. The City Hall was built originally by the city of Washington, at a cost of seventy-eight thousand dollars and upwards. Afterwards, in 1823, Congress appropriated $10,000 for accommodations in that house. They made no other appropriation up to 1849, when they appropriated the $30,000, of which the Senator from Maine now speaks. That made their appropriation $40,000, and the city appropriation $78,750, for the erection of that building. When you made the $30,000 appropriation, the city gave up to the Federal Government one half of the building, and therefore gave you all the accommodation they could give. If Congress invited them into an agreement with which they could not comply, by asking you to give them more accommodation than the subsequent growth of the business of the Government enabled you to give them, it would be very hard to try to enforce the contract, especially seeing, as you must, that for the cost of the building, you having one half of it, you are in arrears $38,000. You paid $40,000 and the city $78,000; you own half the building; and all you are asked to do is, to come up pretty well to the standard of paying for your half. Your courts sit there. It is not for the accommodation of any officer of the city government, but the accommodation of your own criminal court, that this appropriation is asked. There is no room in the building for that court, and none can be provided without a further outlay of money from somebody. Will you demand it of the city? I hope not. It has paid already $78,000 to your $40,000. I know such a provision exists as the Senator from Maine speaks of. I think I moved the original amendment myself, and that proviso was put on in the Senate. It passed in that form. The money was expended under the authority of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury had it all arranged to his satisfaction at that day. The increased demands for the accommodation for courts in the District of Columbia show that there is not room enough in the building to accommodate the courts. I hope the amendment will pass.

Mr. GREEN. I have no word to say on this amendment; but the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] is not now in his seat. He told me he had an amendment to propose to strike out the appropriation for the coast survey. I intend to vote with him, and I intend to support his amendment when it comes up. I mention this to show that it is utterly impossible to get through the bill to-night. ["Let us go on."] I have one or two amendments to propose on my own hook. As we cannot get through to-day, and we have done pretty good work this week, I move that the Senate adjourn. ["Oh, no!"]

Mr. BROWN. I hope not. Let us get through these little District amendments.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. BIGLER. I, like the Senator from Mississippi, have nothing to say on the amendment, but I should be glad to have some understanding as to the chance of finishing this bill.

Mr. BROWN. Take the vote; that is the best way.

Mr. BIGLER. If we are to be kept much longer with this bill, we ought to go into executive session. There are a large number of nominations that ought to be confirmed, and some to which I presume there will be no objection. A number are important, and ought to be disposed of to-day. If the Senator from Virginia thinks we cannot get through with the bill to-day, I will make a motion for an executive session.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope not. I cannot say whether we can get through the bill or not. I cannot say what amendments are to be offered. Let us go on.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have several amendments from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that I wish to offer, and among them is the amendment now pending. I am very glad the Senator from Mississippi has offered it.

Mr. BIGLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. IVERSON. Is that motion debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks not.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT. I intended to say something on the amendment; but if it is likely to pass, I shall not occupy the time of the Senate. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, and also from the judges of the courts on the subject, containing an unanswerable argument as to the propriety of this appropriation, but if it is likely to pass I will not say a word.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. In line two hundred and one of the original bill, I move to strike out the word "Potomac" in the following clause:

"For repairs of the Potomac, Navy-Yard, and Upper bridges, $6,000."

This is the old controversy about the Long Bridge. I have been opposed to the bridge all the time, as Senators know. The Senate expressed its determination at the last session of Congress to make no further appropriations to that bridge for reasons which I will not undertake to weary the Senate at this late hour of the evening, by recapitulating, taking it for granted they are fresh in the recollection of every one. Why it is that this estimate was made in the face of the refusal of Congress to keep up the bridge, I do not understand. I suppose there is some law, under which the Secretary feels it his duty to make the estimate, but I feel it my duty to move to strike it out. I move to strike out the word "Potomac."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not propose to argue the matter, but I wish to say that if it had not escaped my notice, I would have moved to strike it out in committee. It must have got there by indirection I think, for I am satisfied it would not pass either House without inspection.

Mr. HUNTER. It is in the bill from the House.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know it is; and I should have moved to strike it out if I had noticed it.

Mr. HUNTER. This is a matter in which a large portion of the people of my State feel a deep interest; and I believe a majority of the people of Washington feel equally as much interest. I believe that if it were put to the people of the city of Washington to say, a large majority of them would be found to declare that they believe this one of the most useful connections that exists. I am sure that so far as the people of Virginia are connected with it—from where we get our marketing—there is no other connection which they would value as much. Now, I do not see why this should be stricken out; I do not see why it is that we keep up bridges to connect us with Maryland, over the Eastern Branch, and strike this out. So far as the old objection is concerned of the mud flats, I believe that when it comes to be examined, it will be found that those flats would exist in any event; and I am unwilling to stand by without remonstrance and see that bridge stricken down. The effect will be to break up the connection, and leave us to a ferryage over the river; and that at a time, too, when a through ticket has been established in order to accommodate the whole line of travel from New York to New Orleans.

Mr. MASON. If the motion of the Senator from Mississippi is persevered in, I shall feel it my duty as a citizen of Virginia, representing her and interested in the welfare of the city of Washington, to state somewhat at large the reasons which will operate on me in voting against striking out the appropriation, without any discourtesy, certainly, to the honorable Senator. It seems to me that to do so would involve to some extent the faith of the United States.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope not.

Mr. JONES. It is raining very hard, and we cannot get home. It is no use to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not a debatable question.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 15, noes 22.

Mr. MASON. The Long Bridge was built a good many years ago by a private company, an incorporation. They found it an unprofitable investment, and after expending a great deal of money in keeping it up, the Congress of the United States took it off their hands, paid them, I do not know what, and relieved that company from the duty of furnishing this communication; and ever since that day, now nearly twenty years ago, if not more, Congress has acted as though under an obligation to Virginia to keep that bridge up, and has from time to time appropriated for it. The bridge which is across the Eastern Branch, near the navy-yard, and the bridge which is across the Potomac above Georgetown, both being toll bridges, have been also taken possession of by Congress purchasing out the proprietors, and from time to time they have expended public money in keeping those bridges up. Now it is proposed by the honorable Senator from Mississippi to withhold an appropriation from the Long Bridge. This is a very scanty one and can have the effect only of making the most temporary repairs. It is proposed by the honorable Senator to withhold that appropriation for the purpose of allowing that bridge to become impassable and to be no longer of use. That can be the only object the Senator has in withholding this appropriation.

I would say, with all respect to the Senate, that Congress having taken this bridge out of the hands of the original owners, who were citizens of Washington, and having come under at least an implied faith to keep up this communication, to destroy it at once without substituting something in its place, would be a want of faith on the part of the Government. I hope, therefore, that the appropriation will not be stricken out.

Mr. BROWN. The clause is this:

"For repairs of the Potomac, Navy-Yard, and Upper bridges, $6,000."

How the money is to be apportioned, I do not understand; but I suppose about $2,000 to each bridge. I stated in the beginning, that I moved to strike out the word "Potomac," and if that prevailed I should move to reduce the appropriation by $2,000, the sum which I suppose is intended for the repair of that particular bridge.

Mr. GREEN. It is the most important bridge of all, and I shall vote for it.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to suggest one consideration. They have lately established a through ticket for the shortest line of travel from New York to New Orleans, and that line of travel has either to pass over the Long Bridge in the winter, or else be interrupted; because let that go down, and there is no other in its place. Just at the time we have entered into this arrangement, the Senator from Mississippi proposes to strike out this connecting link.

Mr. BROWN. I do not know that it is any business of the Government to be providing bridges for private companies to sell through tickets. You might as well say let us provide one over every other river, and if one happens to be broken down, let us provide a new one. It is none of our business to do any such thing. This whole business of keeping up this bridge involves the question of running railroads through your principal streets and across your principal avenues. There are half a dozen companies now importuning Congress, log-rolling, seeking in every shape and form, to be allowed to cross through the heart of your city and through your principal streets with a railroad. There is a company urging the right to cross this very bridge with railroad cars: I am opposed to it. I have no objection to see them cross a bridge above the point of navigation. That is only about a quarter or half a mile above Georgetown where piers have already been erected, over which a bridge can be constructed at comparatively little cost.

By making that connection, the engineer who made the survey says the railroad connection between Washington city and Alexandria will be some twenty minutes shorter in time than it ever can be by crossing at the Long Bridge, though the distance is greater. That is so, for the reason that railroad cars can only cross bridges at the rate of five miles an hour; the Long Bridge is a little more than a mile long; the other route would be about two hundred and fifty or three hundred yards long; and the time saved from crossing the bridge, would more than compensate the loss in distance between the two cities. Then you would do no injustice to Georgetown; you would not be constantly obstructing navigation to her port; you would have no Government work below your presidential mansion, creating miasma, sickness, disease, and death, as this Long Bridge has been doing for the last twenty and more years. I did not think of alluding to these things in the beginning; because the Senate has so often expressed a determination not to keep the bridge up, that I supposed it was one of the foregone conclusions; and no one now would struggle to keep the Government's hands on this bridge, if it was not his settled determination sooner or later to force a railroad passage across there at the expense of the Government, for there is no railroad company on God's earth that ever will construct a railroad bridge there. The estimates are, that a bridge can be built at the point above Georgetown, for less than one million dollars; and the estimate for a bridge at the site of the Long Bridge, is largely over three million dollars.

I know what this will result in, in the end. I know why it is so pertinaciously insisted upon. It is, ultimately, to force a railroad bridge across at the site of the present Long Bridge. Apart from that, there is nothing in the question. It is not the little $2,000 that is connected with this appropriation. I do not care a sixpence about that; I would just as soon it was made as not. But there are very important considerations of health, commerce, and great public convenience, connected with this question. Make your railroad connection at Georgetown. You need not annoy the city of Washington by having railroad cars running through your principal streets and avenues, a dozen or twenty times a day. The connection can be made, as is shown by a survey, from very near the site of the present depot, through one of the back streets, even so far out as Boundary street, down Rock creek, to its junction with the Potomac, then up to the present site of the aqueduct, and across the Potomac to the South, in less time than it can be made the other way, and with no annoyance to anybody. If the Government will not build a railroad bridge at the site of the present Long Bridge, private companies will construct their roads in the other direction, as they ought to do.

Mr. GREEN. I look upon this bridge as one of the great conveniences of Washington. I have seen nothing on this side of the Potomac to sustain the city either in meat cattle, in the ordinary provisions, or anything else. If you destroy it, I do not know what will become of Washington. Maryland has nothing to supply its place. But, apart from that, the Senator from Mississippi says that it is no business of this Government to keep up bridges to accommodate the public for mails or otherwise. I answer, that his own amendment leaves an appropriation to make a bridge across the east branch of the Potomac, and other bridges in the District of Columbia; and so far as the principle is concerned, he is violating it just as much, if you adopt his amendment, as if you do not adopt it. But the great question comes back: ought this bridge to be kept up? Ought Congress to help to keep it up? These are the two points to which our attention ought to be directed. So far as I am concerned, I think it ought to be kept up. I have no prejudices to Georgetown. If they want a bridge there, it can be made; and if proportionate aid ought to be given to Georgetown to make a bridge, let it be done. But here is an appropriation already made. Three fourths—yes, four fifths of this bridge is permanent. It is founded upon the base, and built up from the foundation of the river. It is not temporary work. Across the channel, on the east and on the west side, perhaps I ought to say on the north and on the south side, it is tressel work, which does decay and require repair. It leaves open the channel of communication. Vessels can still pass through, and do pass through, as I see nearly every day. It is a convenience to the city of Washington; it is a convenience to the traveling public; it is a convenience to the citizens of Virginia; and it affords a good supply to the market of the city of Washington. I should very much dislike to see the bridge destroyed.

On the score of health, I think it a very late period to rise here and make objection that it, by its obstruction of the channel, has generated a miasma detrimental to the Executive mansion. I do not suppose that the insalubrity of the Executive mansion will cause anybody to decline being President. [Laughter.] The incumbent can go to the Soldiers' Home, or some other point, to recuperate. If you fail to keep up the repairs, the very point of this bridge at which it is pretended the accumulation of the sediment has caused the miasmatic influence, is where there is a permanent embankment in the center of the stream. If you intend to remove that it will cost you $10,000,000. I announce to the Senate to-day, if you intend to counteract the very thing to which exception is taken, it will cost you $10,000,000. Will you do it? I know you will not. If you will not, why will you consider the pretext that is urged? Take away the tressel work on both sides, and the cause of the increase of the sediment still remains, and it ever will remain until you take away that which first produced it. If you remove all that embankment and remove all that sediment collected west of it, it will cost you more than ten million dollars, and it will cost you more than one million to keep it removed. I reason from the nature of the thing itself. You have thrown in your embankment, and I challenge any engineer to call in contest a single assertion I make on this subject. I challenge any one. I say it will cost $10,000,000 to remove that which you say is a cause of objection. What Senator here proposes to remove it? Does the Senator from Mississippi? I ask him, do you propose to remove that?

Mr. BROWN. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that it seems to me he is talking entirely out of the record. A very intelligent civil engineer, employed by the Government on account of his superior intelligence to make the survey and estimate what it would cost, came to the conclusion that it not only would not cost $10,000,000, but, under a proper system of management, it would absolutely be a matter of pecuniary profit to the Government; and I will explain how that is. By making the improvement according to the calculation of Captain Rives, a very highly intelligent scientific man, the filling in from the grading of the grounds above would make ground inside, where the marsh now lies, and above the tide, which being sold at the existing price of land, would return all the money you pay.

Mr. GREEN. Is it possible that the United States is to engage in the business of making land in order to sell it? I recollect reading an anecdote that occurred in Europe. A Yankee there was approached by some of the Europeans, and asked, "Well, you have approached the Pacific coast; you have gone up to the Pacific border; where now will you go?" Well, now," he replied, "don't take on any airs; we are going to cart the Rocky Mountains out into the Pacific, and make a hundred miles of land there." [Laughter.] That is just like the Senator from Mississippi. He is going to cart in the mud out of the bottom of the Potomac to make land; and whose property will it be? You say you are going to pay the expense of carting it out and making land by selling the land; but whose land will it be? Where are the riparian rights of proprietors? What right have you to put the mud of an embankment opposite my land, and sell that as public land, and cut me off from the river? You have no right, and the moment the question ever comes before the courts, they will so decide.

Then, where will you put it? You will put it opposite the Washington Monument, and when you put it opposite the Washington Monument, how will you sell it? "Oh," you will say, "this must be appropriated to the public benefit; ornamented with trees; and $50,000 will be required to ornament it;" and so you will lay the foundation for a new tax upon the Treasury.

In every aspect in which you view this question it is fraught with danger; beware of it! There is a cause now existing to which the Senator turns attention that cannot be removed without an expenditure of $10,000,000. If you do not intend to expend that $10,000,000, pay no attention to that cause. If you do intend to expend the $10,000,000, do it at once; say so boldly at once. That being thrown out of the question, we have a communication which can be kept up with $2,000 a year. It will accommodate the city of Washington; it will accommodate the State of Virginia; it will accommodate the traveling public. It is but carrying out a promise which the public had a right to expect would be fulfilled. Will you forfeit all that on arguments and hypotheses that have no foundation in truth? for all these questions about miasma and the filling up of the Potomac have no word of truth in them in point of fact; and if there is any truth in them, it will take $10,000,000 to remove them. It cost $10,000,000 to build a canal where you did not remove more square yards of mud than you will find in this bridge and in the sediment west of the bridge. I know the expense of erecting the mud machines. I know the difficulty of excavating from the bottom of a river. If you undertake to remove it you will incur an expense which this Government will never be able to bear; and that is not all: in five years after you have removed it, bridge and all, you will find one half of the difficulty that now exists, and in ten years you will find the whole difficulty. It is from the current of the Potomac, and the channel, and the wash.

Why, sir, in Scotland and in England there are rivers which, a century ago, were navigable one hundred miles, that could not now be navigated by even a canoe. Take Aquia Creek in Virginia. I have seen warehouses there, and large vessels freighted with hogsheads of tobacco from the door of the warehouse; and the last time I was there, I saw an old man standing out in the middle of the meadow, and he told me the water had drawn off until land had been made; and that is the way it was the last time I was there. You cannot now approach within two and a half miles of Aquia.

It is the natural course of things. In the wash and settlement of a country, the Potomac must fill. It does fill. Bridge or no bridge, the Potomac is destined to fill, and why need we talk about keeping up, by excavating machines, the channel of the Potomac up to Georgetown. I tell you, Mr. President, that I believe that bridge to be important. I believe the pretext urged against it to be frivolous, unfounded in fact, unphilosophical, unstatesmanlike, and that this amendment ought to be rejected. It leaves still an appropriation of the same amount for a bridge across this little creek out here, called the Eastern Branch. Why, I understand that within the memory of men now living, vessels went up the Eastern Branch as far as Bladensburg, and took in freights.

Mr. MASON. Far above that.

Mr. GREEN. I am told by the Senator from Virginia, far above that.

Mr. MASON. Up to the Relay House.

Mr. GREEN. The Senator tells me up to the Relay House. Will you excavate the Eastern Branch? Will you keep up your navigation? Will you make people sickly along there by permitting sediment to collect? How are these things to be obviated? It just shows that it is utterly impossible to obviate these things. Natural causes work by natural laws and produce natural results. Let the bridge alone; keep it in repair; keep up this communication; accommodate the great traveling public; accommodate the city of Washington; accommodate the people of Virginia, who supply the markets of Washington, by which we get something to eat.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This matter has been voted down several times since I have been in the Senate, and I am a little surprised to see it come up in this shape. I am very confident that if it had been understood in the House, it would not have got into the bill without debate. I believe heretofore that these propositions making appropriations for bridges have stood separately, and we ought to consider them separately; but being all together for one object, it certainly was overlooked; for, as I stated before, I would not have acceded to it in committee, if I had observed it at all.

The debates that took place heretofore exhibited two points. In the first place that this was a bridge to be kept up at the expense of Georgetown, and at the expense of the salubrity of the upper portion of this city for the purpose of accommodating some farmers over in Virginia, and for the great purpose of accommodating a railroad, by having connection across the river. That is the simple explanation of it. We had that fight here at the last Congress. Those rails were laid down a year or two ago without our permission, and contrary to our suggestion. We absolutely refused to allow them to cross the city, and they were laid down by the permission of the corporation of Washington, after the vote taken in the Senate, and they remain there still, for they have never been taken up. The idea is not abandoned. It is kept up to this day, and will be kept up, and I do not know that any vote we can pass here will convince them that they cannot carry it, either directly or indirectly, some time or other.

After the repeated expressions of opinion on the part of the Senate, by so large a vote as we have had, I am really surprised that this matter should be again urged. It only shows the extreme pertinacity of corporations. I do not feel disposed to go over the subject again. I do not feel disposed to punish Georgetown any longer, or to punish ourselves and the city by keeping up this bridge for the sake of affording facilities to this railroad corporation. I wish simply to say it is no argument to my mind because the Government chose, upon the solicitation of others, to be generous enough some years ago, to make that a free bridge, and keep it up year after year, there is a moral or legal obligation to keep it up eternally, whatever may be the evil consequences following from it. That seems to be the argument of the honorable Senator from Virginia, that because at a previous date, on the solicitation of the people interested, Congress assumed the expense of making that bridge free, and have ever since, or up to a recent period, kept it up, at the expense of the Government; we, therefore, have entailed upon ourselves the obligation to keep it up perpetually and cannot let it go down without a breach of faith. If the people of Washington want to rebuild that bridge, they can do so. We do not propose to interfere with them; but have urged it upon them repeatedly. It is a matter of contest between these two cities in great part.

Mr. MASON. The Senator will indulge me a moment. He does not do justice to my view of that matter. I said the public faith was pledged, as I considered, to continue this bridge as a means of passage across the river until some other mode was provided for that object. Now, the honorable Senator says that I go to the extent of saying it is incumbent on the country to keep it up forever. Certainly not; but I said they should keep it up until some other mode is provided of accommodating the interests that have grown up under the bridge. The bridge is now the property of the Government. Who has any right to interfere with it? Will it be expected, either, that a private company, the city of Washington, or anybody else, will invest their money in what appears necessary to keep that bridge up while it is the property of the Government, without some assurance that they shall be reimbursed in some manner? Let the Government turn it over to the city, or let it turn it over to the private company from which it took it, or make some disposition of it which will enable those interested, or the localities of country that are interested, to keep it up. That is what I mean to say. They must provide some means.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then let those who want it, or the city, come here and ask it, if that is your proposition. When that proposition shall be made, and there is time enough to decide it, I have no doubt Congress will be ready to abjure all right to interfere with it in any shape or form at any time; but that is not the question. The question is, whether we shall keep it up ourselves, not whether we shall give it to somebody else, and whether we shall do it by making these appropriations year after year.

Now, sir, the argument of the honorable Senator is the same precisely, when carried out, as it was before. He says we are under an obligation to keep up that bridge until some other mode of passing the river is found. What is the consequence of that sort of argument? It is this: that as long as these people will not build another bridge—which they will not do so long as they hope to have this one rebuilt—the obligation is upon us to build another for them before we refuse to keep up or repair this one; that is to say, because we bought it for them and kept it up for a series of years for them, the legal and moral obligation upon us is to build another or keep this one up perpetually; and when we build another bridge we are to keep that up perpetually, too. The argument seems to me perfectly inconclusive. I do not propose to weary the Senate with it. I wish them to understand precisely what the question is, and to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have acted upon it hitherto and so decidedly, time after time, that it seems to me it ought to satisfy people, and that we should not be solicited further on this subject. I know that the Senators from Virginia always take the same precise ground that they have to-day. They have urged this matter upon Congress, session after session, and the Senate, as often as they have urged it, has refused to listen to their solicitations in regard to it. I hope the Senate will still continue to do so. At any rate, do not let us expend money and place ourselves in a position where we shall be sprung upon again. I believe the proposition is now before the Senate in the shape of a petition, at any rate, to allow this railroad to run its trains across Pennsylvania avenue and through some other avenues of the city, from the place where the depot is now, to and over the Long Bridge. What is the reason for it? The engineers have decided that the proper place would be above; and the only motive for this plan is to save money to a railroad company. They can save money by going this way; they can save the cost of excavating; although they do not save time, they save distance and expense: and that is the great interest which is at the bottom of this thing at this present moment, in my judgment.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will vote at any time to transfer this bridge to its original proprietors, or the District of Columbia. I do not think it ought to be a tax upon the Government. It is so now. I shall vote for this appropriation, however, upon a simple principle of what I believe to be economy to the Government; for, but for the embarrassed state of the finances of the Government, I think I am justified in saying that you would have had submitted here to you, at this session, a bill making an appropriation for a new bridge at Georgetown, and there is the whole secret of the matter.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator allow me to move that the Senate adjourn?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will not detain it two minutes. I shall, therefore, vote to keep in this appropriation for the very purpose of avoiding that necessity which will be forced upon us of building a new bridge; and, however earnestly my colleague may resist it, I tell him—and I hope he will remember it—that, when that time comes he will witness the project go through. Just as certain as he is a living man; just as certain as the proposition will be made, there will be a new bridge built when the proper state of the finances will justify it; and we should have had a bill here this session but for the embarrassed condition of the Treasury. I am going to vote for this limited appropriation for the very purpose of avoiding that necessity.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move that the Senate adjourn. We cannot get through the bill this evening.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 20, noes 15; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 29, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. T. H. Boccock, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

NATHANIEL GODDARD AND OTHERS.

Mr. COMINS. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote laying upon the table the adverse report of the Committee of Claims in the case of Nathaniel and Benjamin Goddard. I do not propose to call it up at this time, but at some future day I shall make a few remarks upon it, showing the injustice which Congress is doing to these claimants and to itself, by the summary manner in which it disposes of private claims.

The motion to reconsider was entered.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Treasury in reply to House resolution asking information as to the Louisville and Portland canal.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move to refer the communication to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move that ten thousand extra copies of the report be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope no extra copies of it will be printed.

The motion was referred to the Committee on Printing.

JOHN CASSADY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, the papers having reference to the claim of John Cassady for services at the Charlestown navy-yard; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ANTHONY WALTON BAYARD.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to call the attention of the House to a bill which was passed yesterday increasing the pension of Anthony Walton Bayard, of Bellefonte, in the State of Pennsylvania.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported the bill giving him twenty dollars per month. The House struck out "twenty" and inserted "ten." I have been informed by the clerk of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that this gentleman is now upon the pension roll, placed there under the law, at twenty dollars per month, and that his application was for an increase of pension, or for extending it back. The committee reported in favor of giving him twenty dollars, the exact amount at which he has been pensioned at the Pension Office, and we amended the bill so as to give him only ten dollars per month. I think, under the circumstances, the House ought to reconsider its action, and reject the bill.

By unanimous consent the vote by which the bill was passed was reconsidered, and the bill was laid on the table.

POST ROAD BILL.

Mr. ENGLISH. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to ask the consent of the House to report a bill establishing certain post roads.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. REILLY. I object to that bill.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I would inquire of the gentleman from Indiana if there is any general legislation in the bill?

Mr. ENGLISH. I will state in reply to the gentleman, that there is nothing in the bill except the establishment of certain post routes.

Mr. REILLY. The bill establishes two post routes close alongside of one another, and it must destroy either one or the other of them.

Mr. ENGLISH. I desire to say, that if any routes have been omitted in the bill, and gentlemen will indicate them, the bill can be amended in the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the objection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is that the bill establishes two post routes within a mile or two of each other.

Mr. ENGLISH. If it is not desirable that the service be put upon both routes, the Post Office Department will not put it on both.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was going to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this bill simply establishes the routes; it puts no service upon them. That is a matter in the discretion of the Postmaster General.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. How many sections are there in the bill?

Mr. ENGLISH. There are sixty-five pages of it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The first section, I suppose, is about the routes.

Mr. ENGLISH. There is nothing whatever in the bill but what its title indicates—the establishment of post routes.

The bill was being to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

DELEGATE FROM MINNESOTA.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I am instructed by the Committee of Elections to make a report upon the petition of William W. Kingsbury, Delegate from the Territory of Minnesota. I do not know that there will be any difference of opinion in the House on the conclusion at which the committee have arrived. If it is the desire of any gentleman that the report shall be printed, I shall not object; but, if not, I desire that it shall be acted on now. It is known that, by the resolution of the House, Mr. Kingsbury is excluded from his seat. The committee have come to the conclusion that he ought to be admitted to his seat, and I present the report, accompanied by a resolution to that effect.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the report will be printed.

Mr. GROW. Let us devote to-day to private business, and act on the report on Monday.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Then, sir, I move that the report be laid upon the table, and printed; and I will call it up on Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, of Connecticut. I ask that the minority have leave to present their views, and have them printed.

Mr. GILMER. I do not know that it is proper to call it a minority report, but Mr. Fuller, who claims a right to represent the Territory, wishes to have the whole case presented for the consideration of the House.

Leave was then given to the minority of the committee to present their views, and have them printed.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the standing committees be called for reports of private bills; and that to-day, in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, bills to which no objection shall be made shall first be considered and passed off.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order.

Mr. KELSEY. I believe that we are within ten days of the end of the session.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but the previous question was ordered yesterday on four or five bills.

Mr. PHELPS, of Minnesota. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill of which previous notice has been given.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business has been called for.

RUFUS DWINEL.

The bill of the Senate (No. 189) for the relief of Rufus Dwinel, reported yesterday from a Committee of the Whole House, upon which a separate vote had been asked, was then taken up; the question being on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In accordance with the understanding which was had in committee yesterday, I demand the yeas and nays upon that bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think it is right that the report shall be read to the House.

The report was read.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. It was the understanding yesterday, when this bill was laid aside, that I should have an opportunity of saying three words in reference to it. I dissented from the conclusion of the majority of the committee in favor of this bill, but did not make an objection yesterday, as I was unwilling to prevent the action of the House upon it, when I had no hope that the principle on which I based my opposition to the bill would be recognized by a majority of the House. I now merely wish to state the grounds upon which I dissented. It is well known, as a matter of course, that there is no right of action against the United States, and that whatever may have been the decision of a jury or court, it would not be binding upon Congress. That, however, is not the ground upon which I based my objection to the bill. I opposed it upon the ground that this claim had been at a previous period submitted to Congress; that it had been considered by Congress, and that Congress had decided to allow the principal, but not to allow any interest. According to my opinion, when a claim has been once presented to Congress, and has been fully considered and decided, that should terminate the matter. Congress, in such cases, acts in a judicial character; and I am clear that a party should be concluded by a final decision, in the same manner with respect to a claim as he is when a claim has been presented to a court of justice and finally adjudicated upon. I merely wished to state the principle upon which I dissented from the majority of the committee in relation to this bill, and will not attempt to enforce my views by argument.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Do I understand that a jury has decided upon this case?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Yes, sir; they decided to allow the principal, but no interest.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Well, if the jury decided to give the principal, I think Congress ought to give the interest.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should like an opportunity to make a few remarks in explanation of the principles upon which the majority of the committee acted.

Several MEMBERS objected.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 119, nays 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Arnold, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bowie, Bryant, Bullington, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Caskie, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, John Cochrane, Colfax, Conliss, Corning, Cragin, James Craig, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Daves, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Hatch, Hawkins, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kelllogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lamar, Leiter, Lovejoy, Macloy, Samuel S. Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, William W. Phelps, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Ready, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Sandidge, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Ellihu B. Washburn, Israel Washburn, White, Wilson, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, Augustus B. Wright, and Zolllicoffer—119.

NAYS—Messrs. Atkins, Avery, Boyce, Branch, John B. Clark, Clemens, Cobb, Cockrell, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Dowdell, Edmundson, Garnett, Gartrell, Goode, Greenwood, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Lawrence, Letcher, McQueen, Mason, Miller, Millson, Moore, Peyton, John S. Phelps, Quimlan, Reagan, Ruffin, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, William Smith, Stallworth, Miles Taylor, Vallandigham, Waldron, Watkins, and John V. Wright—49.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

JAMES FUGATE.

House bill (No. 462) granting an invalid pension to James Fugate, of Missouri, reported yesterday from a Committee of the Whole House, upon which a separate vote was asked, was next taken up for consideration.

Mr. JEWETT. I simply desire to say that I think that bill ought to pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LETCHER. I think the gentleman who reported that bill ought to explain it.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. Let the bill and report be read.

The bill and report were read.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. BLAIR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELIZABETH M'BRIER.

A bill (H. R. No. 504) for the relief of Elizabeth McBrier, surviving child and heir of Colonel Archibald Loughery, deceased.

The SPEAKER. That bill has been reported from the Committee of the Whole House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KELSEY moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 162) upon the petition of Arthur Edwards and others.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 170) in the case of John L. Worden.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 171) in the case of John H. Waggaman.

The SPEAKER. These adverse reports were reported from a Committee of the Whole House, with the recommendation that they be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The reports were referred accordingly.

LOGAN HUNTON.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 174) in the case of Logan Hunton.

The SPEAKER. This report has been reported from the Committee of the Whole House, with the recommendation that the report of the Court of Claims be concurred in.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

JONAS P. LEVY.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 173) in the case of Jonas P. Levy.

The SPEAKER. This report was reported from the Committee of the Whole House, with the recommendation that the report of the Court of Claims be concurred in.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

COURT OF CLAIMS ADVERSE REPORTS.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 159) upon the petition of Joseph Ratcliff.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 160) upon the petition of Oliver Dubois.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 164) upon the petition of A. O. P. Nicholson.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 166) upon the petition of Joshua J. Guppy, judge of the county court of Columbia county, Wisconsin, as trustee for the claimants and occupants of Portage City.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 167) in the case of Charles Wilkes.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 168) in the case of William Davenport.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 169) in the case of William B. Fitzgerald.

An adverse report (C. C. No. 172) in the case of John L. Wirt.

The SPEAKER. These adverse reports from the Court of Claims have been reported from the Committee of the Whole House, with the recommendation that they be concurred in.

The reports were concurred in.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the standing committees be called over for reports of private bills, for reference only; and that to-day, in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, bills to which no objection shall be made shall be first considered and disposed of.

Mr. KELSEY. I propose to offer the following as a substitute for the gentleman's resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House to-day be instructed to take up the Private Calendar, and such bills as are not objected to shall be laid aside to be reported to the House; and in cases where objection is made, the opponents of each bill, and the friends of each bill shall be allowed five minutes to answer such objections; and the vote shall then be taken on such bill and such amendments as may be proposed thereto.

Mr. STANTON. I have a resolution which is similar to that of the gentleman from New York.

Instead of five minutes, it allows ten minutes for explanation on bills objected to.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HUGHES. I want first to have read a resolution which I have drawn up.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I prefer my own resolution, and would like it to be put to the vote of the House.

Mr. MILLSON. Has the proposition of the gentleman from New York been accepted by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The SPEAKER. It was not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to any such change of the rules as that proposed by the gentleman from New York. It would cut off debate.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I object to the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of offering my resolution.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suppose it is not in order to enter into debate; but I desire to say that I would like to see the resolution of the gentleman from New York passed.

Mr. STANTON. That will come in as a substitute.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to make a suggestion? I see, by the terms of the resolution, that all bills reported from committees are to be referred, although there may be no objection to them in the mind of any member. Why should that course be adopted? Those bills are of as much interest as others; many of them are Senate bills, to which there will be no objection. I do not see why they should be placed upon the Calendar while it is agreeable to the House to pass them.

Mr. CHAFFEE. My object was not to give bills coming in to-day precedence of business already on the Calendar.

Mr. GROW. I suggest that bills from the Court of Claims ought to have precedence.

The question was taken; and, on division, there were—yeas 112, nays 35.

So (more than two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and Mr. CHAFFEE's resolution received.

Mr. CHAFFEE demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. STANTON. Now, as we cannot have an opportunity to vote upon a substitute, I call the yeas and nays upon ordering the main question.

Mr. KELSEY. I ask for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The main question was then ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RITCHIE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER then commenced the call of committees for reports of a private nature, commencing with the Committee of Elections.

JOHN WOOD AND OTHERS.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the petition of John Wood and Benjamin T. Riley, reported it back, and asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be laid on the table. It was so ordered.

APPRAISERS IN CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of the appraisers in the Charleston custom-house, asked that the committee be discharged from the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce. It was so ordered.

CALEB SHERMAN.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report back Senate bill (No. 338) for the relief of Caleb Sherman, and to ask that the bill be put upon its passage. It appropriates no money whatever.

The bill was read. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in settling the accounts of Caleb Sherman, collector at Paso del Norte, to allow to his credit $975 60, the amount of Government money of which he was robbed on the 6th of November, 1855.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SMITH, PERKINS, AND SMITH.

Mr. LETCHER. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report back Senate bill for the relief of Elijah F. Smith, Gilman H. Perkins, and Charles F. Smith, of Rochester, New York; and I ask that it be put upon its passage. It seems that the firm in Rochester, for whose relief the bill is, purchased of Sturges, Bennett & Co., one hundred bags of coffee, which were in bond in Boston, and executed the usual bond for the payment of the duty. But by mistake the coffee was sent on to New York, and delivered to Redfield & Co., who forwarded it to Albany. The parties, when they heard of it, transported it back to New York, and asked to have it rewarehoused; but in the mean time the bond executed at Boston had come to maturity, and the collector refused to receive the coffee, and exacted one hundred per cent. penalty on the amount of duty. The simple object of this bill is to authorize the refunding of this one hundred per cent.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. W. COCHRAN.

Mr. HOWARD, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of J. W. Cochran; which was laid upon the table.

MARY PETERY.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (No. 173) for the relief of Mary Petery; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BERNARD M. BYRNE.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (No. 282) for the relief of Bernard M. Byrne; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RICHARD FITZPATRICK.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (C. C. No. 393) for the relief of Richard Fitzpatrick; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHARNER T. SCAIFE.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (C. C. No. 183) for the relief of Charner T. Scaife, administrator of Gilbert Stalker; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FRANKLIN PEALE.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (No. 293) for the relief of Franklin Peale; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZA E. OGDEN.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 363) for the relief of Eliza E. Ogden; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of George K. McGunagle, and the memorial of George M. Weston; and that the same be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CORNELIUS BOYLE.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, bill (C. C. No. 24) for the relief of Cornelius Boyle, administrator of John Boyle, deceased; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES HUGO.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon the memorial of James Hugo; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

FREDERICK ZARRACHER.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon the memorial of Frederick Zarracher; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

H. A. CLOPPER.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon the memorial of H. A. Clopper; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM P. BOWBAY.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported back the memorial of William P. Bowbay, and moved that the committee be discharged from the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The motion was agreed to.

P. S. DUVALL AND CO.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill (No. 331) for the relief of P. S. Duvall & Co., with an adverse report thereon. The bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN GRAYSON.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the same committee, reported back Senate joint resolution (No. 38) for the relief of John Grayson, and asked that it be put on its passage.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read.

It appropriates $526 13 to refund money advanced upon the certificate of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIDSON moved that the vote by which the joint resolution was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEPHEN R. ROWAN.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill (No. 330) for the relief of Stephen R. Rowan.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I ask the consent of the House to put that bill upon its passage. It makes no appropriation of money; and it is important that it should pass at this time, in order that the person for whose benefit it is intended may receive the advantage of it. It is to relieve a judgment against him.

No objection being made, the bill was read.

It provides that Stephen R. Rowan shall be released from the judgment entered against him in the district court of the United States for the district of Illinois, upon the payment of costs.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL V. NILES.

Mr. MOORE, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill (No. 131) for the relief of Samuel V. Niles, with an adverse report thereon.

The bill was laid on the table; and the report ordered to be printed.

C. EDWARD HABICHT.

Mr. MOORE, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill (No. 284) for the relief of C. Edward Habicht, administrator of J. W. P. Lewis; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, JUNE 1, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 158.

HALL AND COZZENS, AND NAYLOR AND CO.

Mr. GOODWIN, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Hall & Cozzens, and Naylor & Co., which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GOODWIN. I ask the consent of the House to put this bill on its passage. These men entered into a contract with the proper officers of the Government for furnishing the Government with iron roofing and cornices for the United States Government buildings at the capital of the Territory of Nebraska. They have fulfilled their contract, as appears from a communication which we have received from the Treasury Department, which is embodied in the report. They have been paid a portion of the amount of their contract, but before it was finished the appropriation was exhausted. This bill simply authorizes the Treasury Department to pay what shall be found due them. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. KELSEY. I object to putting this bill upon its passage, and will object to any bill being put on its passage in this way, for the reason that it is doing great injustice to the cases which have been heretofore reported and placed upon the Private Calendar, where a single objection will prevent them from being reported. I want these bills all to take the same course, and take their chances together.

Mr. GOODWIN. I appeal to my colleague to withdraw his objection. These men have performed their contract, and have been without their pay ever since 1855.

Mr. KELSEY. I cannot withdraw my objection.

The bill was then referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY SMALLY.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, from the Committee on Commerce, made an adverse report upon the memorial of Henry Smally; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

SIMON DE VISSER.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill (No. 103) for the relief of Simon De Visser and Joseph Villarubia, of New Orleans; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back House bill (No. 538) for the relief of settlers on certain lands in the State of Illinois. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the bill be put on its passage.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. This bill has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Public Lands. A similar bill was passed a few days ago, for like settlers in Wisconsin. It is recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It is necessary that it should pass.

Mr. BRANCH. I make the point of order that this is not a private, but a public bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is not a private bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that all objection will be withdrawn, and that the bill will be passed.

Mr. HOPKINS. I object; and I shall object to putting any bill on its passage until all the committee's have been called. My objection is not directed specially against this bill. Some committees have not been called for months.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. The bill passed for settlers in Wisconsin, a few days ago, was decided to be a private bill.

The SPEAKER. That bill set out that it was for the relief of Simon Drew and others.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I can make the title of this bill read in the same way.

The SPEAKER. If that bill had been read through, instead of going to a Committee of the Whole House, the Chair would have referred it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that this bill will be allowed to go to a Committee of the Whole House, and take its chance with the other bills. It is a meritorious case.

Mr. BRANCH. I insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot receive it as a private bill.

JOHN L. ALLEN AND ASA R. CARTER.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Public Lands, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill (No. 162) for the relief of John L. Allen and Asa R. Carter, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

It was so ordered.

Mr. COBB. I have a small Senate bill here, for a poor man, which I am directed to report from the Committee on Public Lands. I will ask that it be put upon its passage.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I object.

GENERAL LA FAYETTE.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I have a report to make, which I ask may be put on its passage.

Mr. HOPKINS objected.

Mr. WALBRIDGE then, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back Senate bill (No. 71) to amend an act entitled, "An act to authorize the relocation of land warrants Nos. 3, 4, and 5, granted by Congress to General La Fayette, approved February 26, 1845," with an amendment; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BOOKS FOR A COMMITTEE.

Mr. COBB. I ask to offer a resolution. There are missing from the Library of the Committee on Public Lands two volumes of the Statutes at Large. The resolution authorizes the Clerk to supply them. They were lost during the recess.

Several MEMBERS objected.

SHELDEN M'KNIGHT.

Mr. ENGLISH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made an adverse report on the petition of Sheldon McKnight; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

CHARLES H. MERCER.

Mr. ENGLISH, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Charles H. Mercer; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

CITIZENS OF CLARK COUNTY, OHIO.

Mr. ENGLISH, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of sundry citizens of Clark county, Ohio; which was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

GEORGE G. SMITH.

Mr. ENGLISH, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the bill (H. R. No. 579) for the relief of Dr. George G. Smith, late postmaster at Atlanta, Georgia; which was laid upon the table, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ALLEN L. PORTER.

Mr. ENGLISH, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Allen L. Porter; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

LUCIEN B. ADAMS.

Mr. ENGLISH, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Lucien B. Adams, executor of James Adams, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. ENGLISH. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report a general bill, merely to have it printed and referred. It is a bill making appropriations for post offices, and other public buildings, &c.

Mr. KELSEY. I object.

SAMUEL H. WOODSON.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution for the relief of Samuel H. Woodson; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. I ask that that resolution may be put on its passage.

Mr. KELSEY. I object.

The resolution was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN SCOTT AND OTHERS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Iowa, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill (No. 118) for the relief of John Scott, Hill W. House, and Samuel O. House; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN KELLY.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of John Kelly; which was read a first and second time, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN W. NYE.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill for the relief of John W. Nye; which was read a first and second time, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

TWO PER CENT. FUND OF MISSOURI.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill (No. 303) giving the assent of Congress to a late law of the Missouri Legislature for the application of the reserved two per cent. land fund of that State; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

AUSTIN E. SMITH.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Austin E. Smith, assignee of W. Wallace Ward; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

NOTARIES PUBLIC.

Mr. HOUSTON, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, an act (S. No. 3) authorizing notaries public to take and certify oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments in certain cases; which was laid on the table.

JOHN ROBERTSON.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of John Robertson, of Petersburg, Virginia; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

EXPLANATORY RESOLUTION.

Mr. BILLINGHURST, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, Senate resolution (No. 17) explanatory of a joint resolution giving an increased compensation to all the laborers employed in the Legislative and Executive Departments of the Government in the city of Washington, approved August 16, 1856, and asked that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. ENGLISH. I wish to know if that explanatory resolution is the one referring to the compensation of messengers in the Post Office Department?

Mr. BILLINGHURST. It is.

Mr. ENGLISH. It ought not, then, to be laid upon the table. It ought to pass. The resolution proposes to put the messengers in the Post Office Department upon the same footing with the messengers in the other Departments. It can be amended, I presume, so as to make it satisfactory to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I will withdraw my motion to lay it upon the table.

Mr. ENGLISH. If it is more satisfactory to the House, I will move to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, which is the committee to which it properly belongs.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is more in that resolution than the distinct proposition to increase the compensation of the messengers. It proposes to give a construction to a law by which you make three regular bureaus out of the offices of Assistant Postmasters in the Department. That will be the effect of its passage.

Mr. KELSEY. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. KELSEY. Then I object to it.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

COSTS IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. BILLINGHURST, from the same committee, made an adverse report on a resolution of the House directing them to inquire into the expediency of so amending the law regulating criminal prosecutions in courts of the United States that defendants shall be entitled to recover their costs in cases where the Government fails in the prosecution, and the defendants are acquitted; and also on two memorials on the same subject; which were laid on the table, and the reports ordered to be printed.

RICHARD D. ROWLAND.

Mr. READY, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill (No. 262) for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of Richard D. Rowland and others, and asked that the same be put upon its passage.

Mr. COX objected.

The bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

GIDEON WALKER.

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Gideon Walker; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.
